It has been said by a gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. FORREST,] that only one-sixth of the trade of Great Britain is carried on with the United States; and that one-half of the trade of the United States is carried on with Great Britain; and from those facts, he inferred that, in a state of a commercial conflict between the two nations, the United States would be the sufferer in the same proportion. This is an interesting view of the subject, and it ought to be examined. From a mere theoretic proposition, the inference would be just; but it is completely reversed by the existing practical state of things; in the existing state of things, the one-sixth of the trade of Great Britain to the United States, is extremely profitable to her. It consists of articles, in some degree, essential to her other trade. Pot and pearl ash, for her linen; indigo, for her cloth; tobacco, for manufactures and re-exportation, and, of course, making a part of the other five-sixths of her trade; lumber, for her Navy and her West India Dominions. Where, as, one-half of the trade of the United States to Great Britain may be a losing trade, a great portion of it consists of luxuries for consumption, after having received the last polish from the artisan; and so far cannot be essential. He thought this consideration had not made the impression upon the Committee which it merited. If the United States be competent to their own supply of useful and necessary articles, or can furnish themselves from other markets, he did not believe that any ill would arise from making articles of mere luxury, less accessible to the citizens of the United States than they now are; on the contrary, he believed it would add to the morals, the wealth, and the independence of the United States. Most of the preceding remarks apply to the trade carried on directly between the United States and Great Britain. Her West India Dominions are more at our mercy; and it is there the dominant nation imposes the most injurious and dishonorable conditions upon our trade. To present to the Committee a general view of this part of the subject, he requested to be indulged with reading a few concise passages from Mr. T. Cox's reply to Lord Sheffield, upon Commerce. This performance, he remarked, had great merit for its intelligence, accuracy, and candor:

GREAT BRITAIN
Prohibits American vessels from entering into the ports of several parts of her dominions, viz.: the West Indies, Canada, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Cape Breton, Hudson's Bay, Honduras Bay, and her East India spice market.

THE UNITED STATES
Admit British vessels into all their ports, subject to a tonnage duty of forty-four cents, or twenty-four sterling pence, more than American vessels; and an addition of one tenth, to the amount of the impost accruing to their cargoes.

GREAT BRITAIN
The United States do not impose double light money on not impose extra light money.

The United States do not prohibit the importation of any British article whatever.

American vessels in most of her ports.

Great Britain prohibits the employment of American-built ships by her own citizens in many branches of trade, upon any terms.

Great Britain prohibits the importation of goods into Great Britain by American vessels, from any other country than the United States.

Great Britain prohibits the importation into Great Britain of any goods from Great Britain by British vessels, of any goods not produced by Great Britain.

The United States prohibit the importation of some American articles in American ships, or any but British ships, into her European Dominions.

Great Britain does not permit an American citizen to import goods into some of her Dominions, and to sell them there, even in British vessels. In other parts of her Dominions, she lays an extra tax on him or his sales.

Great Britain prohibits the consumption of some American articles, of which she permits the importation.

Great Britain prohibits the importation of American articles from foreign countries into British Dominions, even in her own ships.

From the view of the subject here exhibited, it would be naturally inferred, that the United States must be dependent upon the West Indies for their very existence; but it is known, that truth consists in the reverse of this fact; hence, the true order in the nature of things is reversed from artificial arrangements; and, as believed, that nothing but exertion was necessary to restate the just and natural order of things. Let the article of rum be taken as a further illustration of this part of the subject.

Itum affords the whole calculated profits of the subject.

West Indies, the whole of the other products are supposed to be only equivalent to the charges for the support of the Islands. Rum is duties in Great Britain almost equal to a prohibition. The United States furnish its chief, its only, competent market. They afford lumber for the vessels enclosing it. The article itself is a ruinous luxury. Under these circumstances, take a view of the terms upon which this article is supplied to the United States. The carriage is completely monopolized. The carriage of the articles given in exchange, Islands, completely monopolized. The contracts for the interchange completely monopolized. If the United States were to withhold their supplies from the West Indies, either they would become unprofitable to Great Britain, or she must relax the existing conditions imposed on our intercourse with them.

Nothing can be more degrading and insulting to the United States than the temporary suspensions of the prohibitory restrictions. Behold a hungry Colonial Prefect, at least a Prefect anticipating hunger, declaring by proclamation to the citizens of the United States, that if they will furnish him with food within a certain given limited time he will vouchsafe to eat it; and behold the citizens of the United States eagerly catching at this singular act of condescension!

Although it has been contended that our commerce with Great Britain is upon a footing not to be complained of, it has been conceded that our navigation labors under undue restrictions. A gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. GOODRICH], who is remarkable for the perspicuity and definiteness of his ideas, seems to have had rather loose conceptions upon this subject. That gentleman remarked, and it has been repeated, that he was in favor of an increase of tonnage upon all foreign vessels, without discrimination. His motive was the protection of our own shipping. His objection to the discrimination was the competition of France. The gentleman remarked, at the same time, that in case high duties should be imposed upon British manufactures, France, in the present state of things, was disqualified from supplying us. If the gentleman really has the protection of our shipping; as well as the manufactures at heart, by extending his reflections a little further he would have found a consolation in this truth—that the same cause which at present disqualifies France from supplying us with manufactures, would disqualify her from any dangerous competition with our shipping; but can it be deemed a serious and valid objection to the propositions, that France may ultimately participate in the advantages? Is this a proper ground for refusing to our shipping and manufactures a present as well as a permanent encouragement? The same gentleman remarked, that the increased duties would operate as a tax upon our constituents; if this should be one effect, it ought not to afford an objection. If they be productive, it will increase the ability of the Treasury, and it is known that an increase of revenue is anticipated. This objection does not, however, comport with another, which has been indefinitely mentioned by several gentlemen, but has been reduced to more definiteness by a gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. FORREST.] He asserted that three-fourths of our revenue will be affected by the propositions on the table.

This is an important consideration, and merits examination. He declared that no gentleman was more disposed than himself to vote for that portion of revenue which should be deemed essential to the proper and necessary energy of the Government; he thought this part of the subject had been superficially examined; he admitted the revenue may ultimately be lessened, but it will not be lost. There is no certainty that it will be lessened. From his view of the propositions, and the manner in which the blanks will probably be filled, he was of opinion that the revenue would for some time be augmented by carrying the propositions into effect.

This would continue to be the case until the increase of duties should so far diminish importations as to counterbalance the difference between the existing duties and those propositions should diminish the importation of luxuries, so far he thought it would increase the ability of the United States to pay revenue; and he did not conceive the particular mode of drawing revenue was at all important to the United States. But if this argument of revenue be conclusive, at what time will it cease to operate with the same force that it now does? If gentlemen have anticipated the glorious period, divulge the pleasing secret, when the nation may make an exertion for the restoration of violated rights without alarms to revenue!

It has been emphatically remarked by a gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CLARK,] who has had great experience in American affairs, that this was not the language of America at the time of the non-importation associations. This was not the language of America at the time of the Declaration of Independence. Whence, then, this change of American sentiment? Has America less ability than she then had? Is she less prepared for a national trial than she then was? This cannot be pretended. There has been, it is true, one great change in her political situation. America has now a funded debt; she had no funded debt at those glorious epochs. May not this change of sentiment, therefore, be looked for in her change of situation in this respect? May it not be looked for in the imitative sympathetic organization of our funds with the British funds? May it not be looked for in the indiscriminate participations of citizens and foreigners in the emoluments of the funds? May it not be looked for in the wishes of some to assimilate the Government of the United States to that of Great Britain, or at least in wishes for a more intimate connexion?

If these causes exist, it is not difficult to find the source of the national debility. It is not difficult to see that the interests of the few who receive and disburse the public contributions, are more respected than the interests of the great majority of the society who furnish the contributions. It is not difficult to see that the Government, instead of legislating for a few millions, is legislating for a few thousands, and that the sacredness of their rights is the great obstacle to a great national exertion.

Mr. G. remarked, that political considerations, in his opinion, combined in recommending the propositions at the present moment. The European war, the delicate crisis of the war, afforded in his mind strong inducements to the measure. These considerations had been urged with a view to an opposite effect; but he would ask, what time would be chosen by a wise nation, comparatively weak, to address herself to an unjust nation, comparatively strong, for a restoration of violated rights? Would it not be when the strong nation should be so engaged as to be incapable of exerting her whole undivided force in the resistance? This is the case with Great Britain, at present; for, whatever may be the ultimate result of the present European contest, the subjugation of France will require at least another campaign. Here he thought the tart adage quoted by some gentleman, fitted the subject much better than that part of it to which it had been applied. No friendship in trade. The United States only demanded a restoration of violated rights. Great Britain has committed the violation. It was unnecessary to recapitulate the aggressions of Great Britain upon the national rights of the United States. He could not help repeating one circumstance—her subjecting American vessels to seizure and search, and exempting those of Sweden and Denmark. This evidenced a peculiar enmity levelled at the United States. He mentioned this circumstance for another reason. It should be recollected that some unauthorized attempts were made upon the vessels of Sweden and Denmark, and that firm and manly answers produced concessions. As the only neutral nations except the United States, they have set an example which ought to be imitated; notwithstanding the trivial weight of the United States in the scale of European affairs, as has been suggested, he believed that Great Britain would prefer a war with both those nations to a war with the United States.

The recent example of Sweden and Denmark, proves that the British Cabinet are as sensible of the advantages of concession, in some cases, as they were insensible in other cases, of the dishonor of committing depredations on the rights of other nations. Mr. G. thought another consideration of the moment extremely important. The injuries and insults of Great Britain, repeated and continued, have excited such an impulse in the public mind, that the whole people would feelingly second any decisive measures which the Government might adopt for restoring the honor of the nation; and, if a national trial should be the result of the propositions, it would from that cause be commenced under the most pleasing and promising auspices. Several gentlemen opposed to the resolutions have declared themselves for energetic measures to restore the honor of the nation. He wished the gentlemen would specify their propositions, and bring them before the Committee; he thought it would be a much better evidence of their dispositions than objecting to the present propositions without offering a substitute. He declared that he was not so much wedded to the present propositions, as not to be willing to consider any others which might be better calculated to produce the intended effect. A gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LEE,] who informed the Committee that he was not sent here to indulge his resentments, professed at the same time the most violent resentment against the Cabinet of Great Britain, while he pronounced an eulogy upon the British people. If the people would adopt the gentleman's idea, and separate themselves from the Cabinet, he might be justified in his distinction. The proposition, in that case, would be levelled against the Cabinet, and not against the people. In that event, both his resentment and attachments might be indulged. But, if the gentleman would recollect that the disposition of the people towards the United States is communicated only through the Cabinet, that they support the Cabinet, that the Cabinet is the organ of their will, he will find that his distinction is wholly without foundation.

We have been admonished of the propriety of banishing feeling and resorting to judgment. A nation being composed of the aggregate of individuals, he believed possessed the same feelings; and he doubted the truth of the philosophy which advised us to banish an essential ingredient of human nature. Feeling and judgment ought to perform their respective offices; feeling should stimulate our actions; judgment should direct the wisest means for its gratification; patience is an admirable beast of burden, but not of enterprise; it bears misfortunes well, but was never calculated to resist oppressions. The United States have been injured and insulted. Instead, therefore, of patience and forbearance—wisdom, caution herself, would prescribe boldness, enterprise, energy, firmness. America has therefore pursued this conduct, and experience has proved that it is not unwise. He believed that Great Britain calculated upon her own influence, and a want of concert in our councils; now was the time to convince the world that injury from abroad produced concert at home. This conduct had therefore characterized America; he hoped it would always continue to characterize America.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 24.

Ordered. That the Letter from the Governor of Kentucky, enclosing a representation from the Legislature of the said State, respecting an adjustment of a claim of that State against the United States, for the expense of certain expeditions against the Indians, which were laid before the House on the twenty-third day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. HARTLEY:—I have paid attention to the debates, and have considered them myself at my chamber; but, as many of my ideas and reasons have been already expressed in superior language, it would not be generous in me to detain the Committee for any length of time. Indeed, as our deliberation is divided, it becomes me to make a few observations, in order to satisfy my constituents upon what grounds I act.

From the turn the debates have taken, politics are complicated with the present question; and I must observe, that the conduct of Great Britain has not been friendly to the country. She has not delivered up the posts agreeably to treaty, and thereby involving us in an expensive war. The American world is convinced that she has supported the Indians in their war against us. Ammunition and arms they certainly obtained from British agents or factors; and the large body of Indians which was together in the year 1791, part of which defeated General St. Clair's army, and the savages who collected in arms during the last year, must have been subsisted in provisions by the British. No policy of the Indians, in former experience, seems alone to have been adequate to such circumstances. The seizing of the vessels of America, which were bound to France, upon the seas, and taking them into British ports, without regarding whether the places to which they were bound were besieged or not—this is contrary to the law of nations—the wanton cruelty and insolence of some of their privateers, upon the vessels and citizens of this country—besides, there cannot be a doubt respecting the Algerines. They were admitted into the Atlantic by the consent or connivance of Great Britain, and many unsuspecting Americans have been seized on the ocean, and carried into captivity. These are serious injuries, by which the American character is much wounded; and this country calls loudly, from every quarter, for redress.

The resolutions on the table, their advocates contend, if adopted, would operate against Great Britain so forcibly, as to oblige her to change her policy, and do us justice, and lay the foundation for good offices between America and France. Could we be certain that those views would be realized, or those ends attained, by adopting the resolutions, they should have my hearty assent. When those plausible prospects were held forth, my wishes were with part of the resolutions; for several days I have strove to bring my judgment to concur, but I find I cannot. The arguments and reasons offered do not convince me that the resolutions will produce the desired effect of their advocates; and I have many difficulties which, I fear, cannot be obviated. If the duties are laid very high, they will amount to a prohibition. These States are now in a flourishing condition, yet many articles necessary to the improvement, settlement, and comforts of America, are now only to be procured in Great Britain. We cannot expect them, for a time, from any other country, because no other nation is in the habit of manufacturing them; this will produce a great depression in our commerce and manufactures. If Great Britain were to stand the shock, no good would be derived from the system, and we risk our national importance and prosperity. If the duties should be increased ten per cent., or any large sum under a prohibitory duty, the goods, if necessary, would still be imported, and the tax fall upon the consumers.

My great difficulty is, that the resolutions will tend to increase the price of labor in husbandry. The protecting duties already laid have increased the manufactures of this country; I believe, in most cases, they have had great effects. Perhaps some alterations might be made; but the subject of manufactures is so important, that it should be taken up separately. The protecting duties have been, as I said, favorable to the manufacturers; but, it must be acknowledged, they have enhanced the price of labor very considerably, and this has extended to husbandry. If you increase the protecting duties, the manufacturer will just add the difference to his price. Of course, the farmers must bid higher for labor, in order to prevent the countryman or adventurer from going into a manufactory or work-shop. I have always been, and still am, a friend to the manufactures of this country; I wish them every proper encouragement; but I am sure, we might go too fast. I believe—according to my experience—the manufacturers seem well satisfied with what has been done. The cultivation and improvement of our country are primary considerations, and we should adopt no policy which disturbs them. Wheat and flour are the great staple commodities of the Middle States; we should do nothing to check their increase. After agriculture, press on the arts; they ought all to be protected. These resolutions will either operate as a prohibition or a tax; the inconveniences of both have been stated.

There is still a serious difficulty: three-fourths of our revenue, it has been said, depended upon the duty arising on articles imported from Great Britain and her Dominions. If these resolutions will amount to a prohibition, (which the gentleman from New Jersey contends they should,) how is the deficiency to be supplied? This question has been repeatedly asked, but not answered.

In the late war, a great part of the personal property in Pennsylvania was changed into paper; goods were sold, or taken for the supplies of the Army; individuals paid debts to individuals in paper; moneys were loaned to the United States; so that the public was really and truly indebted to many meritorious and bona fide creditors. I am no friend to those speculators who obtained certificates by ungenerous means; they can only come forward under the term of strict right. The public creditors of Pennsylvania, (among whom I knew many meritorious ones,) at the first session of Congress held at New York under the present Government of the United States, petitioned the Legislature, and the House of Representatives resolved as follows:

"Resolved, That this House consider an adequate provision for the support of the public credit, as a matter of high importance to the national honor and prosperity.

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to prepare a plan for that purpose, and to report the same to this House at the next meeting."

Congress passed an act, the 4th of August, 1793, entitled "An act making provision for the Debt of the United States." By this act, a loan was directed to be opened and provision made for the payment of the interest to such creditors as should subscribe thereto, with power of redemption at certain times. Adequate funds were established, and the Legislature, by the same law, solemnly engaged that those funds should be applied accordingly. The Legislature was not to invade or alter those funds without regular and adequate substitutes. By the resolutions offered, the funds will most assuredly (in my mind) be endangered. We are going upon speculations, the consequences of which we know not; and which may shake the fundamental principles of public credit, which has been so solemnly guaranteed. We ought not to act like mere Colonies, in proposing or entering into non-importation agreements. We are a Nation; we ought to conduct ourselves in such a manner as not to endanger the faith, credit, and reputation of America. In contracts between individuals, they are morally and legally bound to comply with them. Nations ought to be equally bound by their solemn engagements.

We are, in this business, not barely waging a commercial war against Britain, for many citizens of this country have their all depending upon public faith. The Dutch, and other Europeans, have largely subscribed, and invested their property with us, under equal confidence. Shall we, or dare we, destroy or divert any of the funds so pledged, without giving a substitute? I consider these resolutions inefficient to the purposes intended. I hold that Great Britain has acted in such a manner as to render it necessary to press for full and satisfactory explanation; and that, in case this satisfaction is not granted, that at some day before the rising of Congress, the subjects of war and peace be taken up. If the former should be decided upon, I hope our Eastern brethren will join us, and that we may be unanimous in our measures. The extent of this first resolution is so great, I will most assuredly vote against it; as to the others, I shall hold myself at liberty to declare myself upon them as they come forward.

Mr. TRACY spoke as follows: It is observable that many gentlemen, when they rise upon this subject, apologise for the want of a clear comprehension of it; and the indefinite situation of the proposition now before the Committee, and indefinite reasoning upon it, have, I acknowledge, afforded one strong ground of argument, in my mind, against the resolution. I think the maxim defensible, that no resolution, until its principles are clearly defined, and its consequences well understood, should be adopted by a Legislative body, especially on a commercial subject, since it is a given point, that commerce has generally bid defiance to Legislative interference, and in the event triumphed over Legislative restrictions.

The discussion of this subject has assumed an appearance which must be surprising to a stranger, and painful in the extreme to ourselves.

The supreme Legislature of the United States is seriously deliberating, not upon the welfare of our citizens, but upon the relative circumstances of two European nations; and this deliberation has not for its object the relative benefits of their markets to us, but which form of Government is best, and most like our own; which people feel the greatest affection for us; and what measures we can adopt which will best humble one and exalt the other.

The primary motive of these resolutions, as acknowledged by the defenders of them, was not the increase of our agriculture, manufactures, or navigation, but to humble Great Britain, and to build up France; and, although it is said, our manufactures and navigation may receive advantage, it is only mentioned as a substitute in case of failure as to the great object of humbling Great Britain.

The discussion in favor of these resolutions has breathed nothing but hostility and revenge against the English; and yet they put on the mild appearance of commercial regulations. Legislatures, always cautious of attempting to force trade from its own channels and habits, should certainly be peculiarly cautious, when they do undertake such business, to set about it with temperance and coolness; but, in this debate, we are told of the execution of a former treaty withholding Western posts, insult, and dominations of a haughty people; that, through the agency of Great Britain, the savages are upon us on one side, and the Algerines on the other. The mind is roused by such a group of evils, and then called upon to consider a statement of duties on goods imported from foreign nations. If the subject is commercial, why not treat it upon the basis of a commercial subject, and with coolness attend to it? If it is a question of political hostility or war, a firmer tone might be adopted. When a nation is oppressed on all sides by injuries which call loudly to be avenged, there is an imperiousness in their circumstances which often precludes deliberation; and sometimes, at least, denies its propriety. Promptitude of action, in the first form that presents itself, is frequently a virtue; but, when all this national pressure is to obtain redress from laying a duty on a few articles of commerce, one would hardly think the violent introduction, much less, an impassioned mode of debate, could strike any man with propriety. I think this mode of treating the subject tends to confuse, and contains in it no aptitude to develop either principles or consequences. After making these observations, permit me, sir, to consider the question before the Committee merely as a commercial one, and, for a moment, lay aside Indians, Algerines, and all such irritating objects.

I engage it shall be for a moment; they certainly shall have a full consideration in a future part of my argument. To perform this task with propriety, the state of our commerce naturally presents itself as the first object of inquiry. In this I am anticipated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEXTER,] and by a number of incontestible facts contained in the official document before the Committee. Our commerce is flourishing, and our navigation rapidly increasing.

I, sir, was bred a farmer. I live among farmers, much further removed from a view of commerce than any of my colleagues, and when these resolutions were brought forward, I expected the painful detail that our commerce was languishing and our tonnage decreasing, and that our mercantile interest was earnestly calling for the aid and protection of Government. But in this expectation I am agreeably disappointed. No merchant is complaining, nor any fact existing to justify such complaints. It is worthy of remark, and must induce serious inquiry, if our trade is deranged and shackled to the degree pretended, why the merchants in this House should be totally ignorant of it, and why, to a man, they should be opposed to these regulations which put on the specious appearance of affording direct relief to them? This circumstance alone would go far, in my mind, towards negating the propositions; much farther than the closest speculations of a philosopher in their favor, which, nine times out of ten, cannot be reduced to practice.

And here, sir, I feel a confidence in repeating that, upon a subject of forcing trade from one nation to another, which is of necessity so complicated in principle, so various and invisible in consequences, the Committee will never act but with the utmost caution, and will constantly keep in view that trade will seek its own markets, find its own level, and regulate itself much better than we can do; and, although we may embarrass it, and injure our own citizens, and even other nations, for a while, it will eventually rise above all the regulations we can make.

The gentleman who introduced these resolves, aware of our flourishing state of commerce, has acknowledged that, by their adoption, certain evils will be incurred. What are these evils? If we allow full operation to his positions, without an immediate overture in Great Britain, there will be a stagnation of trade, a damp to agriculture, its laborers thrown out of employment, the present surplus of produce must perish on the hands of the farmers, &c. But these evils, he says, ought to be cheerfully borne to obtain, in event, a much greater good. This position is a sound one, to bear present small evils to effect future great benefits. But to make the reasoning complete, should not the gentleman show that the promised good is not only great enough to justify a trial of the present evil, but that it is certain?

Are the benefits promised by these regulations in any measure certain, or even probable? The great benefits promised are a Treaty with Great Britain, a repeal of her Navigation Act as it respects the United States, and, in fact, a universal freedom of trade; and if these fail, an increase of our manufactures, and a course of trade with France free as they please to give us. I know Indians, &c., are talked of; but I mean these are the promised benefits of a commercial kind. Are those events so probable that we shall be justified in trying an experiment at the certain expense of our present tranquility and happiness? It is said our citizens are virtuous: this I have the pleasure to believe. But, to convince the whole mass of the people that a system of self-denial of any great extent in its operation, is to be borne by them for a future benefit, you must hold up that benefit in a more striking and certain point of view than can be presented in this case. They will be slow in understanding that trade is to be made free by imposing more and greater shackles upon it. But, if our commerce is flourishing, say the gentlemen, why should it not be more so? If Great Britain imposes pointed restraints upon our trade, and is expressing her jealousy and hatred to us on every practicable occasion, why not free ourselves? What has Great Britain done, sir? Has she made a single law restricting the commerce of Independent America? All her restrictions that now affect us were in existence while we were her Colonies, and are part of her Colonial establishment. Her Navigation Act is as old as 1660; and, upon strict examination, the United States are more favored in her European, East and West India ports, than any other nation. It is said our trade was at first forced there; but this rests merely on assertion; it is not in proof before the Committee. The markets of Great Britain being the best, our articles of commerce and hers being reciprocally useful, and a similarity of language and religion, with many other natural causes, have carried our trade to her ports, and will keep it there, until better markets offer, or it is forced away.

It is said the credit given by British merchants is an evil, and that the people of Virginia owe an immense sum in Great Britain. When a complaint is made in direct terms of restrictions on our trade, one would not readily imagine that another complaint would be couched with it, that the trade was so free as to become an injury. Besides, credit given to an industrious, provident man, never can be an injury. Will it place us in a situation of fear. If we may argue from a great State, Virginia, to the Union, this is not true; for although that State owes immense debts, her Representatives come forward with great spirit to bring Great Britain to her feet. This circumstance of giving credit is entirely a municipal regulation, wholly out of reach of Congress. The people at the Eastward do not owe the English merchants, and are very generally opposed to these regulations. These facts must convince us, that the credits given us by the trade of Great Britain do not operate a fear and a dependence which can be alarming to Government.

If the municipal regulations of Virginia, or any other State, will place the whole of each man's property within the reach of his creditor, and allow the creditor legal coercion for payment of debts, when voluntary payment is denied, there will be no danger from foreign or domestic credit. The slothful and idle, as well as the spendthrift and wicked, will readily attribute to faults of omission and commission in Government, those evils necessarily connected with their own imprudence.

It is said by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FINDLEY,] that the merchants in this city who possess capitals of their own, are for these restrictions on British trade, and that the poorer sort, who are in want of credit, and must do business by obtaining it, are opposed to them. If this be a fact, which is yet to be ascertained, it affords another argument against the resolutions. If capitalists, nabobs in trade, would wish to shut out of competition men who have not capitals, whose industry and knowledge of business if they can at first obtain credit, would promise them a living and usefulness to community, whence is this wish derived? From nothing but a desire to effect a monopoly of trade to themselves, the consequence of which would be, a profit of 25 or 50 per cent.; and those men who have not capitals must serve them as clerks or quit the country. Liberty and equality is not the foremost feature in this desire of our rich merchants, if the desire exists; and such a doctrine savors more of Aristocracy, and less of Republicanism, than I expected to hear from that honorable member.

It is said the British Government has broken the Laws of Nations, by interruption of our trade to France. The fact is, Great Britain has said France is in siege, or is blockaded—France has said the same. Upon this statement, what is the Law of Nations? That neutral vessels shall not have intercourse with such blockaded or besieged place. The facts are, the English have taken the cargoes of our vessels, under these circumstances, and in every instance paid the value of her cargo, at the port of destination; the French have taken all our cargoes bound to any port of their enemies, and have directed that a committee of appraisal shall be appointed to appraise and pay for them.

And in all instances of wanton treatment, spoliation, or making our vessels prizes, the British Government have made the most ample promises of redress, contained in our Minister's official information. This is a situation which I acknowledge is an evil; but ought not a neutral nation to expect some evils of the kind, especially when we connect with it, the almost unavoidable imprudences, and, I may add, crimes of our own people, in violating the strict line of duty, which must be, and always is marked out, for neutral nations? State it in its worst point of light, and negotiation and remonstrance should precede any decisive Governmental act.

If our trade is flourishing, and under no restrictions by the English, more than she imposes on other nations, where is the ground of revenge against Great Britain? And more especially, when the fact is incontestible, that we have more favor in our trade with her, than is extended to any nation.

But, suffer me to ask, why treaty is made the basis of discrimination? I can hitherto find no man, merchant, or other, can state any benefits which we should gain by a treaty. In all treaties the strongest nation will always make its own construction, and the weakest nation may have the benefit of right, but wanting strength to enforce that right, its voice is not heard in explanation of treaty. Our commercial situation presents itself to us in so much infancy, the events of a month may produce such surprising advances, as has been stated by a gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DEXTER,] that a treaty of good appearances now, may speedily be an evil. Besides, a treaty connects us with European policy, and I feel a strong desire to abstract the United States from all participation with the labyrinth of European policy. What has been the advantage of our treaties already formed? That with France I conclude will be cited as the best.

Regenerated France has told us, that their Government, when this treaty was made, had no good intentions to the United States, or, at least, no views of reciprocating benefits fairly. I suppose the meaning of this is, that, in making the treaty, the Government of France consulted her own interest, and paid not much attention to ours, yet this treaty was at first highly applauded; but let it be tested by the benefits actually received. In considering it in point of actual benefits, I should be glad to find them and dwell upon them, without bringing into view the harm it has done us; but no benefits exist. Does the treaty protect our property in seeking its markets, where neutral nations have undoubted rights, any more than the Law of Nations? England has violated the latter, and France the former. I lay out of the question the group of evils which seemed to result from this treaty the last Summer, the evident danger of a war, prevented only by the conduct of an unparalleled Executive, and many other disadvantages of this treaty, because the unexampled situation of France may have produced many consequences, which will not form general ground of argument, and because those subjects have been very fairly stated by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LEE.]

One trait, and that which was considered as the best in this treaty, was this; all property was to follow the bottom in which it was found. Friendly bottoms made friendly cargo, and an enemy's bottom made prize of the cargo. The Law of Nations is, to discriminate always, so as to make prize of enemy's property, find it where you may. Regenerated France has been in the constant act, under sanction of this treaty, of making prize of all property belonging to citizens of the United States, found in English, Spanish, Portuguese, Austrian, Dutch, and Prussian vessels, I mean since those nations have been at war with her; and what do we gain? It cannot operate in our favor any further than to save French property to them, if found in our vessels, if we had treaties of a similar kind with the world. So that this kind of treaty is uncommonly circumstanced; indeed, we can gain nothing but a protection for our friend's property, but lose directly our own; and we never can be in a situation to gain unless we pre-suppose war, which I hope we may avoid; certainly we are not as liable to war as the nations in Europe, who are generally in war three or four years in every seven: of course this trait in treaties is no very inviting one to us. If treaties are formed in the common style, that is, place the nation treating on the basis of the most favored nations, every one can discern it amounts to little, if anything, more than complimentary language of course.

One great object of these resolves is, to effect a treaty with Great Britain, and we are told in the same breath that Great Britain is in the habit of breaking, not only the Law of Nations, but solemn treaty.

But we are told a free trade, or rather a trade on principles of more reciprocity, is to be obtained by these regulations; and that France gives us that reciprocity, and, of course, we ought to withdraw our trade from the English, and give it to France. If the markets of France, and the benefits of trade in her ports, exceed those of any other nation, our trade will go there of itself; if not, why force it? In this part of the argument, I request the liberty of treating both France and England merely as commercial nations, for, if commercial benefits are not found in the trade of two nations, I very much doubt the continuation of the trade, from principles of friendship.

What favors do we receive from France, which will justify such an exertion to put down her rival and build her up? Our trade is at present under no very auspicious circumstances with France; even in the best of times a merchant having established his correspondence there on the most favored footing, when he sent his cargo could draw bills for one-third of the amount, and they would be honored; the remaining two-thirds, when sold, the American merchant would be advised he might draw for, but no interest allowed for the time the French merchant held the property; but if the amount of bills drawn at first exceeded the third part of sales, interest was charged. The English merchant would honor his American correspondent's bills when accompanied by his bill of lading only, for the whole amount, and cargoes have often been purchased and the insurance, wages, and the finding of the ship, have been paid out of the avails of her cargo, thus anticipated by bills before the voyage. This course of trade, as practiced by the two nations, needs no comment. Are the fabrics of the French better than the English? Is this a proper time to depend upon France for her centre by a war? And can any man suppose the Column established in Lyons, sacred to Liberty, is any more favorable to her manufactures than if no such Column had been there, and her manufactures were increasing instead of diminishing? Does the Government of France admit us into her West Indies, with any favor peculiar to us? The act opening her West Indies was no more for us than the British act is against us; the fact is, neither of them cared for us, they each did what they thought would best promote their own interest.

If these regulations are to unshackle our trade, why not leave it unshackled? The fetters are only changed from one side to the other, and France stamped upon them instead of England. The circumstance of heavily taxing our trade to Great Britain, for the sake of driving it to France, is a proof that it enjoys more freedom where it is. If it be true, that we injure ourselves in the first instance, by these restrictions, although Great Britain deserves punishment, I have said we should be cautious how we sacrifice ourselves to a principle of revenge. But it may be worth inquiry how much it is probable we can injure Great Britain?

It is said, Great Britain depends upon the United States for the bread of her manufacturers and the raw materials which employ them. It ought to be remarked here, that a principal complaint against Great Britain is, that she prohibits our bread-stuff and this is a fact, except in times of scarcity. One would think, to hear the declarations in this House, that all men were fed at the openings of our hand, and if we shut that hand, the nations starve, and if we but shake the fist after it is shut, they die. This language, to say no more of it, will prove our origin to be British and that not long ago, for the same gentlemen say, the British nation is proud in the extreme. It is well known that the Dutch are in treaty with us, and of course are to be favored by the third resolution, which places all nations in treaty with us, on a footing of lower tonnage. It is likewise known that the English have as much ascendancy over the Dutch as propriety would dictate. What would these restrictions do then, at best, but shape the course of our trade through Holland? Our trade might, perhaps, come more from the Texel than the Thames, but the names would constitute the chief difference.

Spain and Portugal, in Europe, and their other Dominions, if once called upon by necessity, can raise bread-stuff to an unlimited amount. And if we refuse our provisions to the West Indies, would not Great Britain thank us for the bounty we should give, in that very act of denial to the Canadian country, which she is so rapidly filling, even with our own citizens? The provisions of every kind which may be raised there, no man can limit with any kind of certainty. But cannot Great Britain retaliate, and distress us in a commercial war? I will not enlarge upon this, it has already been shown that Great Britain can retaliate with tenfold advantages. It is said, although she can injure us in part, she will suffer in the greatest degree, and that our sufferings will be spread nearly over the whole community, each will bear a part, but Great Britain will suffer in one entire class of citizens, her manufacturers. It will be but a poor consolation to our farmers at large, when they find themselves suffering, to inform them, that a very innocent set of men, the manufacturers of Great Britain, are suffering much more than they do; and if they should clamor against Government, it would be an unsatisfactory answer to them that there was a greater clamor, and even mob, in England.

If the proposed duties are low, Great Britain certainly will not suffer. If they are high, what will be the consequences? It does not admit of argument, that the people of this country must import many articles, from some foreign country; we certainly cannot at once manufacture a sufficient quantity for our own consumption. It is equally certain, that, at present, no country on earth can supply us but Great Britain: the consequence will be, that British goods will get here, and the duties being high, will produce smuggling. Our merchants are now proverbial for a combination not to defraud the revenue; but, let your duties be high, and the practice of all other countries will be adopted—there will be associations to cheat your revenue; and this country, by its numerous and safe harbors, affords an unlimited opportunity to defraud the revenue with impunity. A tribute of praise is due to our merchants, for their exertions in the establishment and support of this Government; and, among their virtues, the punctual payment of duties is not the least. But I feel the policy of straining them too hard; an alienation from the Government, and hostility to the revenue, will be the probable consequence.

Our shipping, it is said, will be increased: this can happen only by a failure of reducing Great Britain to terms. This is worthy of notice. Great Britain has gained in quantity of shipping by her Navigation Act; and, of course, say the gentlemen, it is proper for the United States to have a Navigation Act. Great Britain is an island filled with inhabitants, and, if not decreasing, has certainly not increased in numbers for many years. The United States have a great extent of fertile territory, wholly unoccupied, and an increasing hardy yeomanry to cultivate it to the best advantage. Our shipping has rapidly increased, and has gained that point of equality and proportion with our agriculture which a just equilibrium of things demands; this is proved by the advanced price of our seamen's wages. And, besides, there is no more capital to spare for navigation. Our farmers feel the benefit of a competition in the carrying-trade, and it is at least questionable whether it is yet politic to force foreigners out of this competition. We have already, by our discrimination of tonnage in favor of our own vessels, and by the addition of ten per cent. on the cargoes of foreign vessels, nearly destroyed the competition, except to ports where it is difficult, if not impossible, for our vessels to go. With this view of the subject, I confess it is very doubtful in my mind whether an attempt to force an increase either of our shipping or manufactures, would be politic.

At present, sir, I see no ground for revenging on Great Britain; and if there were, I can discern no probability of injuring her as much as ourselves, by the attempt; and a treaty has no flattering appearance to me. One thing had escaped my attention; our treaties are, by the Constitution, the supreme law of the land. This ties us unequally, in case of treaty, as no nation is under equal obligation to fulfill a treaty.

But, the gentlemen say, the Indian war exists, the Algerines are abroad on the sea, committing piracy on our trade, &c. I promised to consider these matters, as, in my mind, they are very serious subjects; and one gentleman [Mr. Giles] has said, if these were removed out of sight, three-quarters of his argument must be lost. Is the Treaty of Peace, as it respects the Western posts, unexecuted? Is the Indian war instigated and supplied by the British nation, and are the Algerines, through the agency of the same nation, destroying our trade and enslaving our citizens? These are serious charges; if true, they deserve the attention of all men, and particularly of this Committee. For the purposes of the present argument, I will suppose that all those charges are specifically and directly proved; and by proof, here, will be understood, that the facts are so far within our knowledge that candor cannot hesitate in a conclusion. If I thought the resolutions under consideration were certain in the production of evil to ourselves, and very uncertain as it respected either our own future benefits or injury to Great Britain, what can I think of them as a remedy applicable to so much injury? When considering the question in this point of view, I am led to ask the gentlemen if they can be serious, in supposing these resolutions are a proper, consistent, and adequate remedy, for evils of the nature and magnitude just recited? I acknowledge my own feelings are very different. If those statements are founded in fact, I cannot justify myself to my constituents, or my conscience, in saying the adoption of the regulations of commerce, a Navigation Act, or the whole parade of shutting ports, and freeing trade of its shackles, is in any degree calculated to meet or remedy the evil.

Although I deprecate war as the worst of calamities for my country, yet I would inquire, seriously, whether we had fulfilled the Treaty on our part with Great Britain? Do complete justice to them first. I would negotiate as long and as far as patience ought to go; and if I found an obstinate denial of justice, I would then lay the hand of force upon the Western posts, and teach the world that the United States were no less prompt in commanding justice to be done them, than they had been patient and industrious in attempting to obtain it by fair and peaceable means. In this view of the subject, I should be led to say—Away with your milk-and-water regulations; they are too trifling to effect objects of such importance. Are the Algerines to be frightened with paper resolves, or the Indians to be subdued, or the Western posts taken, by commercial regulations? When we consider the subject merely as a commercial one, it goes too far, and attempts too much; but when considered as a war establishment, it falls infinitely short of the mark, and does too little.

Mr. Boudinot lamented the want of practical commercial knowledge, when called upon to give an opinion on subjects of so great magnitude and essential importance to this country. But it was with pleasure he took an opportunity of acknowledging the obligation he was under to the gentlemen who had gone before him, for their collection of facts, their calculations and strong reasoning, on the subject, by which his misfortune was greatly alleviated. The calm and dispassionate discussion of so great and interesting a question, must be productive of great public advantage, as well as do great honor to this Committee. It was with the greatest attention that he had heard the various reasonings throughout this long debate. He had examined the facts, he had compared and applied the calculations, he had weighed every argument, and had endeavored to draw some final conclusions to direct his judgment. That which had made the most forcible impression on his mind, and was equally deducible from the arguments used by either side of the House, was, "that every wise nation, under the consideration of all circumstances, endeavored to make their own individual interest the pole-star by which to direct their conduct, whether of a political or commercial nature." He observed, that it appeared to him as clear as any mathematical proposition, that in all the commercial regulations of the nations of Europe, this one object influenced every action. This was plainly seen in all the favorable circumstances attending the arrêts of France in our favor. This, and this alone, had penned every commercial restriction against us by Great Britain. From the whole, then, of the debate, without going into comparison of one nation and her conduct towards us with another, which sometimes led into invidious distinctions, Mr. B. said he had drawn this obvious and determinate conclusion—from the acknowledged attention of old and wise nations to their own particular interests, and which he should make the rule of his conduct on this great question—"to go and do likewise."

But, before he proceeded to the resolutions on the table, he thought proper to premise the propriety of laying out of the debate the charge of the enmity of Great Britain and the friendship of France, as far as either respected the former Government. Politicians and legislators should not indulge passion; the circumstances of the present Government were those that demanded their attention, and by going so far back, they would be exposed to greater mistakes. He said he had already found it very easy to mistake or misapprehend facts of an important nature, when relative subjects that engage the passions as well as the judgment.

Mr. B. said he was not desirous of becoming the panegyrist of Great Britain; he had known too much, he had felt too much, to execute such an office with propriety. He should not overvalue the friendship of France in the aid we had received from her, because he knew that it was not from the Nation, but the Monarch, that the whole of it was brought about. He knew that his sole motive was the best interests of his Crown, and that when he fought with us side by side he had fought his own battles in our country, instead of his own. It was interest that led America to ask, it was interest that led him to comply. But, notwithstanding circumstances of this nature, he was desirous that the whole truth should prevail. He did not approve of half truths, he wished the whole to be known. Great Britain had been repeatedly charged with originating the Indian war. She had been (it was said) always averse to entering into a commercial treaty with us. These facts Mr. B. disputed; nay, he did not believe them. Gentlemen had founded many strong arguments upon them, but it would have been best first to have produced the evidence, to prove their existence. As to the originating the Indian war; so far from its being originated by Great Britain, he knew that it had originated in the false policy of Congress, in 1783. This was no new idea; he had then foreseen it; he had then foretold it, with its consequences. He did not deny that the officers and agents of Great Britain had since encouraged and increased it; that they had not done what they ought to have done, to prevent it. They had claimed the right of aiding the Indians by presents; we, also, as a nation, had claimed the right of aiding the French Republic, in every way consistent with our neutrality. As to her being always averse to a commercial treaty, this also should be taken with some restriction. The facts should be truly stated. In September, 1779, Congress thought it prudent to authorize and instruct their Commissioners to enter into a Commercial Treaty with Great Britain, in case of a Peace. In July, 1781, when a negotiation for Peace was likely to take place, Congress, on the principle that our true commercial advantages were not well understood, thought it best to avoid all unnecessary European connections; and, therefore, in the month of July, 1781, repealed the Commissioners' authority to enter into a Commercial Treaty, and withdrew their instructions. At this critical moment, when Great Britain had acceded to our Independence, and was impressed with the danger of losing our commerce, she came forward, and (if his information was right) proposed a Commercial Treaty, on rational and generous terms, which, for want of authority, was refused by our Commissioners. To this source was the Proclamation of the King of Great Britain owing, by which we were cut off from the West India trade. Before this mistake could be rectified, our disunion as to commercial regulations, and weakness as to national objects, were fully known to Great Britain; since which, he believed, she had wholly omitted to enter into further treaty with us.

He said he had carefully examined the Journals of Congress as to the granting and repeal of the power of the Commissioners; but as to the offering and refusing the Commercial Treaty, he depended on a Confidential Letter he had received in 1783, and which was read in Congress the 1st of October of that year; and as he would not vouch for the authenticity of those facts, but chose that the Committee should have all the evidence he had, he would trouble them with reading the substance of it. Mr. B. then read some parts of a letter dated September 28, 1783, which in substance was—

"I left Paris the 15th of June; the day before which Mr. Hartley had communicated to the American Plenipotentiary and to me a despatch which he had received from Mr. Secretary Fox, authorizing Mr. Hartley to agree to a Treaty of Commerce, allowing a free trade to the West India to the vessels and citizens of the United States, under the single restriction of not carrying the produce of those islands to Great Britain; that Congress would best know the reasons that induced the Commissioners to object to that restriction, and which had eventually frustrated the expectation of a Commercial Treaty with Great Britain. And you will undoubtedly have seen the Proclamation, which, in consequence thereof, had been issued by His Britannic Majesty, whereby the vessels of the United States are, in effect, precluded from all access to the British West Indies. But as the ultimate intentions of the British Minister on that subject appeared doubtful, and as it seemed highly important that they should be known to Congress as soon as possible, and as I had occasion on Friday, the eighth of August, to see my Lord North respecting a matter of private property, I availed myself of that opportunity of conversing thereon with his Lordship, who, with great apparent candor, told me, that the Proclamation and the principles of it would undoubtedly be adhered to during the continuance of the act of Parliament; that Parliament must then determine respecting future measures; that the Navigation Act had been the source and support of the British naval power, and must not be infringed without urgent necessity; that he was desirous of promoting a good understanding with the United States by all means compatible with the interest of Great Britain, but that the Americans, after making themselves independent, were unreasonable—desiring privileges which never had been granted to any independent people, especially as they appeared to have neither the inclination nor the ability to give any adequate advantages to Great Britain in return. I intimated the probability that the United States would retaliate, and prevent their produce being carried to the West Indies in British vessels. To which his Lordship replied, that the United States had doubled the right to adopt such a measure, but in so doing they would necessarily deprive themselves of the best, and indeed the only sufficient market for their produce; obstruct the growth, agriculture, and prosperity of their own country, and injure themselves much more than they could possibly injure Great Britain. That in war, Great Britain was exposed to much expense and difficulty in defending her West India Colonies, and at all times giving them exclusively the benefit of her market, depriving herself in their favor of the advantage of purchasing the sugars, &c. of other countries, and thereby enabling British West India planters to obtain higher prices for their produce than the planters of any other nation; and that unless Great Britain, in return for these favors, could exclusively enjoy the benefits of their navigation, it would, in his private opinion, be much better to let them become independent, like the United States. His Lordship did not request, and I presume he did not expect I would keep this conversation a secret, and you are at liberty to communicate it to Congress: though as I do not wish to be cited on political subjects, I beg it may be confined to that honorable body. I indeed thought it expedient, before I left London, to write an account of it to the American Plenipotentiary in Paris," &c.

Mr. B. then proceeded, and said, that these facts had convinced him that the charge was too general, especially as by the late communications we are informed that a negotiation was now again in train on the same subject. That in his opinion Great Britain had enough to answer for that was justly chargeable to her account, without relying on bare suggestions without proof. Her breach of the Treaty by carrying away our negroes, contrary to the express words, and withholding the posts, without the shadow of excuse, are sufficient evidence of her want of public faith; but let us not found our acts on those facts, which, if introduced into, we cannot support. Mr. B. observed, that he had made these observations to remind gentlemen that though this nation had at times done us wrong, yet that we had not been without fault: therefore, he added, let us dispassionately consider the resolution on the table, on the principle of our present situation among the nations, or as it has been, since our present Government. It cannot be denied that our trade has been in a flourishing condition ever since the year 1790. Let any gentleman who doubts this cast his eye on the Reports from the Treasury Office for several years past: it is fast pressing to perfection.

Mr. B. was of opinion with the gentleman who had gone before him, that it was possible to carry our navigation too far, when considered in proportion to our agricultural interest; but that point was yet to come. He acknowledged that since the late war in Europe, we had been the sufferers; that our ships had been piratically despoiled (if he might be allowed the expression) by the privateers of England, Spain, and France; that our citizens justly looked up to their Government for protection and recompense. The usual established mode among civilized nations was, in the first instance, remonstrance and negotiation; this was not the duty of the Representatives of the people, but belonged to another department: we were officially informed that this was done, a negotiation was on foot, and our Executive officer had fixed the 1st day of December last, when our Minister at the Court of London was to give a positive and decided account of the state of the negotiation. Would it then be prudent for the Committee, until the issue of that negotiation is known, to interfere, or perhaps run counter to our Executive? The departments of Government should be kept separate, and not one counteract the other.

He at length adverted to the resolution before the Committee, and said it consisted of two parts: one relative to higher duties on the manufactures of foreign nations not having any treaty with us, the other to further restrictions on the shipping of those nations. To these, then, Mr. B. said he would confine himself, and thereby greatly narrow the debate. The first inquiry that obviously presented itself, in order to determine the effect, is, On whom will these higher duties fall? The general principle agreed on all hands is, that the consumer pays the duty. The citizens of the United States are the consumers; the citizens of the United States must, therefore, pay the higher duties. This reasoning proceeds on the fact that our citizens purchase the manufactures. The articles mentioned are either necessities or superfluities: if necessities, our citizens must have them; if superfluities, as freemen they will have them, if they choose them; they will lay out their money as they please, unless restricted by laws founded on the true interests of the nation. But it may be said that they may be supplied from home manufactures, or from nations in alliance with us. The first cannot be true, as will be evident from the present state of our manufactures. The supply equal, or bearing any reasonable proportion to the demand, is impossible for many, many years to come. As to other nations, it may fairly be said, with regard to the supply, that France and Holland are the only nations that can be contemplated. It would be cruel in the extreme to put France to the test, under her present critical and distressing situation. She has called all her citizens into the field; if any can be spared, it must be for the purpose of her agriculture, or the manufacture of arms alone. It would expose her to the charge of inability, without giving her the chance of a fair experiment. Every gentleman on the floor knows that Holland, independently considered, has no possible way of yielding us a supply. If she does it, it must be as a medium between Great Britain and us; so that directly or indirectly, we should receive the supply from Great Britain, which would evade the intended effect of the measure. The next inquiry is, How will increasing the duties on our own citizens affect the Government of Great Britain, so as to accomplish the desired end? If their manufacturers obtain their price—if their merchants receive their commissions, how will it affect them, that our citizens pay high duties on the articles here before they are consumed? It may be answered, by lessening the consumption; by increasing our own manufactures; by encouraging other nations to cease a competition in our markets. If we judge from past experience, our habits of economy are not such as will produce this effect to any considerable purpose. Our citizens seldom refuse gratifying themselves on account of a difference of six pence or a shilling in the yard; if they earn their money hardly, they will spend it at their pleasure. During the late war we know the prices were increased one hundred per cent; yet neither the obligation of law, the love of their country, or even, in some cases, the risk of life, will deter from gratifying themselves in the enjoyment of foreign manufactures. The increase of our home manufactures is a most desirable object; and there was no gentleman of the Committee more desirous of promoting them than he was. But this could only be accomplished by time. It was a progressive work, and was now hastening to perfection as fast as was compatible with a due attention to agriculture; but no gentleman would pretend to say that even the hope of a competent supply was rational for many years to come; nay, he verily believed that, if all the wool of the fifteen States was brought together, it would not afford a supply of woollens for one State. But it was proper to look to the encouragement already given to our manufactures. The importations of the United States amounted to twenty millions of dollars; the duties already laid amount to four millions; this, on an average, was twenty per cent. This was a very serious duty, indeed; and, though principally designed to raise a revenue, yet it also acted as bounties to our manufactures; and, when added to the freight, insurance, commissions, and interest, paid by the importer of foreign manufactures, every gentleman must conclude that our citizens would not patiently submit to greater burdens without the most obvious necessity. He added, that, if the specific articles referred to in the resolutions were individually considered, the duties would amount to about fifteen per cent. when imported in foreign bottoms, which would be found very heavy on those articles, and sufficient to encourage our home manufactures consistently with the ease of the citizens. If not these duties already bear a sufficient proportion to the capitals of our merchants? Some gentlemen have objected to the easy credit afforded our merchants in Great Britain, and yet, in the same breath, are for demanding the small capitals of their own, in duties, and refuse them the advantage of foreign capitals, where they can be obtained. He confessed he was not convinced of the dangers arising from public credit which were so warmly urged by the gentleman from Virginia. When he looked at that gentleman, and attended to the zeal he discovered, in what he thought so essential to the welfare of his country, it afforded an answer to every objection so ably supported by him. The gentleman had acknowledged and lamented the prevalence of credit, and that from Great Britain. In the State he came from, he said it universally prevailed, and had its effect on the importing merchant; from him to the country shop-keeper, and thence to the farmer: so that the dependence on the merchant in Great Britain was to be feared through every part of the community, and the most dangerous influence of English politics was to be dreaded. But was there a State in the Union where the policy of Great Britain was reprobated more than in the State of Virginia? Was not the conduct of that gentleman, in the present debate, as well as that of his colleagues, full proof that the credit he complained of did not produce the fatal effects he feared? Was not Virginia the largest, and, if we might judge from her visible capital, (slaves,) the richest State in the Union? And yet she had always been in the habit of unbounded credit in Great Britain.

Mr. B. then reminded the Committee of the nature of the trade with Great Britain. Did the British merchant bring his manufactures and offer them for sale in this country? No; the American merchant employed the merchant in England to purchase of the manufacturers, on a commission of five or ten per cent. The goods were exported at the risk of the American merchant; and whether the consumer paid a high or low duty on them, on their arrival in this country, was a matter of but secondary consideration to the British merchant. Mr. B. then, observing on the patriotic conduct of our merchants with regard to their obedience to the revenue laws, which he thought did them greater honor than could be claimed by those of any other country, warned the Committee against carrying the matter too far; he warned them not to make it the best trade on fair calculation, that one merchant could pursue, to defraud the Government of the duties. When once smuggling became a business which the merchants generally thought themselves justified in, it would be like powerful assailants getting possession of a strong fortress: it would not be easy to dislodge them. It was out of the power of laws to prevent smuggling, if the merchants once determined to adopt it. He said he had carefully avoided saying anything about the Algerines, because, although in his private opinion he thought circumstances bore hard against Great Britain, yet, as a legislator, he could not lay his finger on the evidence, and say this or that proves the fact; and, as he believed some facts had been mistaken, he was afraid of acting without adequate proof. Besides, although he was at first affected by the suggestion, yet, on carefully investigating the process of the business, he thought he could see reasons which might render it possible that Great Britain had a good excuse for her conduct, independent of American considerations. Every gentleman knows that Holland had a considerable trade with Portugal, which she was obliged to carry on with a convoy of men-of-war, on account of the Algerines. Portugal had three or four ships continually cruising on the same account. Great Britain (with these States) was engaged in a war with France, whose fleet, notwithstanding all her difficulties, was rather superior to that of Great Britain. It became then a considerable object with Great Britain to emancipate these ships of her allies from other services, so as to operate with her in the common cause. Again, it was possible that Great Britain, by promoting this trade with Holland and Portugal, might find it easier to persuade the Algerines to declare war against France, the common enemy; this, we are told, has been accomplished; and, if so, must have been a considerable object with Great Britain. If, then, these reasons might have operated with Great Britain without respect to America, we ought at least to wait till we are better acquainted with facts, and this we may soon reasonably expect from our foreign Ministers, especially when we are officially told that the British agent who accomplished this trade had not heard from his Court for eighteen months.

On the whole, Mr. B. observed that, while the duties already laid on the farmer, mechanic, laborer, and other citizens of the United States, were sufficiently high for the support of Government and the protection and encouragement of our home manufactures, while higher duties must in the end fall on those who are already oppressed with those duties that are necessary; while our citizens cannot avoid the duties by a supply from home manufactures, or those of foreign nations in alliance with us; while he was of opinion that nations not in alliance cannot be affected by duties paid by our citizens, he did not think this the time to increase the duties on articles which must be consumed in the United States, for purposes which it cannot clearly and indubitably be proved will answer very essential and important ends to our Government and its citizens. As to the second object of the resolution, he had been always of opinion that it is the true way of accomplishing the ends proposed. He had ever joined the gentleman who brought this forward, in considering the regulating of foreign shipping a principle of great importance to the interest of the United States; and, whenever an answer shall be obtained from our Minister abroad, by which the state of the present negotiation shall appear to be unfavorable to the United States, he would be ready to enter fully into the measure, and hoped then there would be a perfect unanimity in that Committee, which would greatly insure the efficacy of the measure. But as there was reason to expect the issue of the negotiation in a short time, he should be unwilling to agree to any measure of this nature having a principle of retaliation for its object, till the real grievance could be known, and of course the Committee better capable of judging of the adequate remedy. He was averse from forcing any nation into a commercial treaty with us. It ought to be a voluntary act; and he was for allowing the same freedom of action to other nations we claimed for ourselves. But when we could not obtain a reciprocity of benefits, he thought we had the undoubted right of conferring a reciprocity of restrictions. His idea was, when we did proceed on this principle, we should make old and wise nations our example, and copy their acts. This could give no reasonable offence; but, if offence was taken, the answer would be obvious and convincing. Great Britain, by her commercial regulations, had risen to power and opulence; this gave us a right to copy her example; and, whenever the Executive gave us information that negotiation was ineffectual, he was ready to pursue this remedy, as the only salutary and effectual one; but, as this period had not yet arrived, he should wait with some degree of patience for the issue, which, as a friend to both countries, he hoped would be a favorable one, and should accordingly vote, for the present, against the resolution now before the Committee.

After Mr. Boudinot had spoken, Mr. Ames rose, and remarked that it had been repeatedly asserted, in a vague manner, that our commerce is unfavorably situated; he wished the specific grievances stated, and the facts on which they are said to be founded vouched for. One fact is worth a dozen theories.

Mr. Nicholas was astonished that the gentleman possessed so little American feeling as so often to repeat the inquiry he had just made, or that he should attempt to divert the attention of the Committee by a frivolous distinction between commercial and political considerations. The friends of the resolutions had supposed it unnecessary to enumerate; they conceived that every American must feel the wrongs we suffer, and they offered the resolution as a counter-terror. It appeared, however, that they were mistaken, and must be under the necessity of enumerating grievances; it is necessary to tell the gentleman of the hostilities of the savages on our frontiers, of the murder of our citizens, and plunder of our settlements; he must be told of the commercial advantages wrested from our hands by that mean policy which lets loose the Algerines upon our defenceless merchantmen. He hoped it would be allowed that this is a commercial as well as political injury. He enumerated the other injurious restrictions imposed on our trade by Great Britain, contrary to the Law of Nations and every color of right, and then said, that since we suffer in blood and treasure, it becomes proper to inquire whether we can best resist with arms, or by making regulations in the spirit of those proposed, the effects of which will be felt by them in the distresses of their subjects. The Committee had been told by gentlemen who opposed the resolutions, how incapable we are of supporting any but a defensive war; our only alternative, they, is something like the resolutions—that is, to withdraw from them at least the sustenance they receive from us.

Some gentlemen had, to be sure, reduced this question to very narrow grounds, when they chose to throw on one side as inapplicable the injuries we suffer from Indians and Algerines, and the injuries our commerce endures from pointed commercial regulations; and, when all these are put out of the question, they triumphantly ask, where are your grievances? They go further, and attempt to show that America is as favored, in a commercial point of view, as she has a right to expect. The regulations against us in the West Indies are not grievances, because they are of an ancient date, that they are part of a uniform system, and that there is nothing in them particularly pointed at Americans. This, he believed, is a mistake; there is an express law, since the year 1780, excluding all articles from the West Indies, unless carried there under particular circumstances and in British vessels. This is an injury strictly commercial. In answer to a remark that British credit in Virginia does not appear to have generated British influence, he observed, that the natural jealousy of, and aversion to foreigners, who do almost all the commercial business in that State, naturally counteracts the influence of that credit; but, where no such counteracting cause exists—where mercantile transactions are carried on by natives, assisted by foreign credit—there, he believed, the natural dependence of borrower on lender gave deep root to that influence. But the measures proposed do not go to the destruction of credit, but only tend to prevent its abuse. It has been said that Spain and Portugal could supply Great Britain and her dependencies with grain and flour. He wondered at the argument being brought forward, as it is notorious that those countries are among our best markets for those commodities.

A commercial treaty with Great Britain, it is said, is not desirable, because that we have with France is not beneficial. Gentlemen should recollect the date of that treaty, that, when it was made, we had not much to give, and therefore not a right to expect much. The Committee had been told that France had cheated us when they made the treaty with us, because it imposes some hardships now she is at war. This is owing to a contingency unforeseen at the time of making the treaty; and, if we had been involved in war first, it, with as much propriety, might have been said that we had cheated them. Much had been said on the propriety of permitting trade to regulate itself. He approved of the position; but when restrictions are laid on one side, to restore the equilibrium contrary restrictions must be laid. We have no reasonable hope of a repeal of those injurious restrictions, or a redress of grievances from Great Britain. At a time when these were a subject of negotiation, she has let loose the Algerines upon us. What, then, are we to expect as the issue of those negotiations? Would an individual in similar circumstances expect an amicable settlement? In the existing state and nature of the grievances we complain of, it is extravagance in the extreme to expect they can be settled by negotiation. When matters are doubtful, recourse is had to amicable settlement; but if a man stabs my wife or child, will I call on him to explain himself? No, I will have recourse to my power over him, and procure satisfaction. The extent and nature of the injuries we experience put all negotiation out of the question. He dwelt on the propriety of the regulations, as the best weapons in our power to obtain satisfaction. He then took notice of the allusion Mr. Dexter had made to the body politic, comparing it with the natural body, and contended that our body politic, cramped by British trammels, will not acquiesce the strength it is calculated to acquire as speedily as if they were removed. He adverted to the unnatural state of our commerce with the British West Indies, which, though dependent on us for necessities, give us laws, and say we shall not carry those necessities in our own bottoms, except when they are in fear of famine. He then went into a comparative view of the ability of the United States to support a commercial conflict with Great Britain, and being her to reasonable terms, and showed how sensibly a diminution in our consumption of their manufactures would affect her, and excite a rivalry here and in France, to afford a sufficient supply. The distress we should occasion, it had been said, would induce Great Britain to go to war with us. The mischief would spring from them, from their obstinate adherence to the measures she had adopted to our injury. Some members of the Committee had insisted that the resolutions are a dishonorable mode of resisting, and a mean mode of making an attack, that is, that we are to give out of our own hands the weapons with which we can fight, and take up those which we cannot wield. He concluded with some observations on Great Britain's present backwardness to make a treaty of commerce with us; indeed, he wondered how we could expect a treaty from a nation that trampled on our prostrate rights, and how we could wish one, with a nation which persisted in not executing some of the most important points in the last.

Mr. DAVYX remarked, that the injuries we have received from Great Britain had been painted in very strong colors; and when a remedy is proposed, it turns out to be only a set of regulations on paper; the insolence of Britain is contrasted with American weakness. If we really labor under wrongs, something more effectual than the measures proposed should be contemplated; but first it is our duty to endeavor to obtain redress by pacific means, and before irritating measures are adopted, we should be well assured that redress has been refused.

Mr. MADISON saw no ground to hope for redress from negotiation; we must be satisfied that that resource has failed. He could not see, admitting we are injured, that we are bound, by honor or prudence, to resent the injury by the last appeal to arms. It is best, he conceived, to try whether a more pacific weapon may not prove even more effectual. We can make use of none against Great Britain more effectual than commercial weapons; in that part (their commerce) that country is most vulnerable. He thought this the most eligible time for the exercise of those means most clearly in our power.

Mr. SMITH read a passage as to the negotiation now pending between the Government of America and that of England, from the volume of papers relative to Britain lately printed by order of Congress. It is contained in a Letter dated 7th of September last, from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Pinckney, American Minister in London, and is in these words:

"The President, therefore, desires that you will immediately enter into explanations on this subject with the British Government. Lay before them, in friendly and temperate terms, all the demonstrations of the injury done us by this act, and endeavor to obtain a revocation of it, and full indemnification to any citizens of these States who may have suffered by it in the mean time. Accompany your representations with every assurance of our earnest desire to live on terms of the best friendship and harmony with them, and to found our expectations of justice on their part on a strict observance of it on our side."

"It is with concern, however, I am obliged to observe, that, so marked has been the inattention of the British Court to every application which has been made to them on any subject by this Government, (not a single answer, I believe, having ever been given to one of them, except in the act of exchanging a Minister,) that it may become unavoidable, in certain cases, where an answer of some sort is necessary, to consider their silence as an answer. Perhaps this is their intention; still, however, desirous of furnishing no color of offence, we do not wish you to name any term for giving an answer. Urge one as much as you can without commitment, and, on the first day of December, be so good as to give us information of the state in which this matter is, that it may be received during the session of Congress."

Mr. S. inferred that very little was to be hoped for of that nature.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States, in foreign countries—

Mr. CLARK said, the time of the Committee had been taken up for seven days in debating this question, and yet there appeared to be as little prospect of bringing it to a decision as there was at the beginning. He believed there could hardly be mentioned an instance of any public body protracting a discussion for so long a time, for what purpose he could not understand, unless it was the passion of members to see their speeches published in the newspapers. For his part, he seldom made long speeches, nor did he take the trouble to write them for the newspapers. He did not see any very material advantage that the business of the public received from this waste of time, and he therefore had hoped to see the Committee come to an issue on the question. His hopes, however, he feared, were in vain; for, on looking around, he could perceive that several members were getting themselves in readiness to deliver more fine speeches; and, since it would be impossible to prevent them, he would not at present waste any more of their time by making a speech for the printers; indeed, they generally publish his opinions very erroneously when they made a speech for him. Before he sat down, however, he remarked that most of the members had made up their minds how to vote at the commencement of the debate; and, therefore, he thought the waste of time was the more inexcusable, as he was nearly certain that no proselytes would be made either on the one side or the other. Under these impressions, he would sit down patiently, and, since he could not mend the matter, he would join in helping to pass away the time by listening to some of those gentlemen who seemed so impatient and felt so big with their speeches that they would burst, he feared, should he stand up any longer to prevent their delivery.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, in replying to Mr. CLARK, said, that it was the right of every gentleman to assign the reasons for his public conduct, if he saw proper. For his part, he did not wish to consume much of the time of the Committee. He was not in the habit of making long speeches, and, though he could not charge the member last up with exhausting the patience of the House, yet he never failed of exercising a right which he now appeared to wish to deprive others of; but, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman, Mr. H. said he thought it his duty not to give a silent vote on a subject of such magnitude. He had heard with pleasure, and had been much instructed by the observations that had been made, and wished to hear what further might be said on a subject that might affect the most important interests of his country. For some time past he had, from his own observation, from the high price which our produce had borne, and the great demand there had been for it in the markets, from the pressing demand for seamen, and from the concurrent testimony of merchants and people of every occupation, been led to believe that the commerce of the United States was in a most prosperous train. He had no reason to suspect his opinion till those resolutions were brought forward. They surprised him the more as coming from a quarter of the country from which he least expected anything of the kind, and from which, only two sessions since, opposition was made to measures which had the same object in view, so far as respects the encouragement of navigation and manufactures; because it was said that such encouragement, though it operated to the advantage of the Eastern, was a direct tax on the Southern States. This made him less solicitous, at that time, to urge measures that might have an unequal operation on the different parts of the Union. What great event has turned up since to work this extraordinary change? He supposed the gentleman must have discovered some great impositions and embarrassments on our trade, which had escaped his attention. He had therefore listened with great attention to hear them pointed out. As to theories, he thought they ought not to be attempted, but in extreme cases, unless the object was important and its attainment certain. He had inquired into the restrictions laid by Great Britain on the commerce of the United States, and, from that inquiry, as well as from the report of the Secretary of State, he found that the same restrictions are laid on other nations; that there is no marked distinction against us; but that the United States enjoyed many and great advantages over other nations. He thought it unnecessary to go into a particular detail of those advantages, as the other gentleman had already done it. He therefore was of opinion that, to adopt the measure now under consideration, would be hazardous those advantages for the uncertain chance of obtaining something which was only in prospect.

A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles] had mentioned the discriminating favoritism of Britain to other neutral Powers, viz: Denmark and Sweden, which was the only instance that even the ingenuity of that gentleman, so sagacious in finding out difficulties, could point out in the navigation laws or commercial regulations of Great Britain, in which any discrimination was made to the disadvantage of the United States; and even that is not one of which we can complain. It was a regulation adopted in consequence of her present situation, as being in a state of war, and not for commercial purposes. The article complained of is in these words:

"That it shall be lawful for the commanders of his Majesty's ships of war and privateers that have or may have letters of marque against France, to seize all ships, whatever be their cargoes, that shall be found attempting to enter any blockaded port, and to send the same for condemnation, together with their cargoes, except the ships of Denmark and Sweden, which shall only be prevented from entering on the first attempt, but, on the second, shall be sent in for condemnation likewise."

This article needs no other comment or justification than to read the remark of the Secretary of State, in his Letter to the British Minister on this subject:

"We had conjectured, but did not before certainly know, that the distinction which the instructions make between Denmark and Sweden, on the one hand, and the United States on the other, in the cases of vessels bound to ports blockaded, was, on the principle explained by you, that it was yielded to those countries by treaty, it is not unfriendly to refuse to us, because not yielded to us by treaty. I shall not contest the right of the principle, as a right to its reciprocity necessarily results to us."

And it is upon this ground that our conduct in admitting French privateers and prizes into our ports, and excluding those of Great Britain, is justifiable. If, then, the advocates for the resolutions cannot find out any instance in which Great Britain has made discriminations to our advantage, and many instances are shown in which we enjoy advantages beyond the most favored nations, can we complain?

The United States have not a sufficient number of ships to become the carriers of her own produce, and he much doubted whether the time was come when it would be for the advantage of the United States to extend their navigation so far as to answer that purpose; and, should an imprudent adoption of these resolutions deprive us of British vessels, our produce would perish on our hands. Since we have not shipping equal to the carriage of our whole exports, we can surely find sufficient employment for those we have, independent of the trade to the British West India Islands, and though it would be a desirable thing to be admitted into that trade, yet is that an object of so much importance that we could be justified in hazarding the most important interests of our country to obtain it? If the advancement of our navigation and manufactures is the real object, why adopt the discriminating quality? Is it not putting us in the power of other nations, and giving them great advantages, without an equivalent?

Since it is admitted that we do not enjoy any special advantage from any commercial regulations now have, it is my opinion that, if any regulations are adopted, they ought to be general. If any nation wishes for an exemption, and will give us an equivalent, we can secure it to them by treaty. If we secure to them the exemption by law, they will be under no inducement to grant it as an equivalent. France, whose interest is intended to be advanced, has never come forward and requested such a discrimination. Why, then, should we do it unsolicited? Ought we to return the late generous and friendly conduct of Portugal by extending the discrimination to that nation? The gentleman who brought forward the resolutions seemed to be sensible of the impropriety of such a measure, and therefore proposed to draw a line which should exclude that Kingdom. This would point the resolutions so directly against Great Britain that it would be much better to come out in an open and manly way, and call her by name, than to do it in this indirect mode.

He closed his remarks on this part of his argument by saying that it was a question that admitted of some doubt whether the commerce of the United States was not at present in as prosperous a situation as was for the interest of the country; and whether it would be for the general welfare to give it a greater stimulus than it now had, so as to divert the young men and farmers' sons from other occupations, and especially that of agriculture, and by that means, under the pretence of encouraging navigation, to do a real injury to America! He said he would now bestow a few observations on the political considerations which are urged to induce the adoption of these resolutions; and a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles] has told us that three-quarters of his arguments and inducements for adopting them are derived from that quarter. Say the gentlemen, the Treaty of Peace has never been complied with on the part of Great Britain. They excited a savage war on our frontiers and Algerine depredations on our commerce.

These are serious evils, that readily address themselves to our passions, and any attempts to palliate or lessen their influence could not, he was sensible, meet with a very favorable reception. When we are, however, called upon to deliberate upon great national concerns, which involve both the honor and most important interests of our country, we ought to examine with the cool, deliberate eye of a judge, and not under the influence of passion. That Great Britain has violated the treaty, does not admit a doubt, and that she was also the first to violate; but, if we look at home, shall we not have the candor to own that we have also violated that treaty? Do not some of the public officers admit that we have? There are mutual complaints, and the Executive has put them in a train of negotiation; and, as the various acts of the State Legislatures, by the adoption of this Government, has opened the Federal Courts in an honorable manner to the claims of British subjects, the principal ground of complaint against the United States has been removed. And the able and masterly manner in which the Secretary of State has arranged and brought up the matter, he flattered himself, would satisfy the Court of Great Britain, and induce a full compliance with the treaty on their part, he thought the matter was reduced to such a situation that she could not withhold her compliance. A letter has been sent to the British Court, through her Minister, on the subject, to which no answer has yet been received; and one gentleman has gone so far as to call the delay a fresh insult. He thought that candor required that we should admit that the reason they had given for this delay had some weight. Have we not ourselves considered Great Britain as being in a very critical situation? Has not that, in fact, been the case? Have they not considered the Government itself as being in danger? If a man's house was on fire, was it to be supposed that his attention could be engaged in regulating the mere unimportant concerns of his family? Surely no candid man will say that the Government of Great Britain is very criminal for having delayed an answer to those representations which have been forwarded from this country. It could not be expected that they would instantly lay aside all their great national concerns to decide upon them. It does not seem to have been expected by the Executive.

He noticed in the President's instructions to Mr. Pinckney, he was directed not to commit himself by ill-timed or too ardent demands. He was to urge an answer as much as possible, without commitment, and, on the first day of December, to give information of the state in which the matter was. The time in which we might expect an answer has not yet arrived. We ought to wait a reasonable time. If the answer should be unfavorable, and all hopes of success from negotiation should fail, and there should be no prospect of a compliance with the Treaty on the part of Great Britain, it will then be time enough to bring the subject under consideration. He wished to have it fairly brought up, unconnected with any other matter, and such measures adopted as should be judged best, upon mature deliberation, and after deeply weighing every circumstance. At present, the subject appeared to him to be prematurely brought forward.

The Indian war is also charged upon Great Britain, and that is urged as a reason for adopting these resolutions. Has any member produced any evidence? are we possessed of any proof to support this charge? It is an important principle of a free Government that no man shall be condemned unheard. If we admit this principle in regard to an individual, why not allow it to a nation? Have we ever charged Great Britain as being the instigator of those injuries we have experienced from the depredations committed on the inhabitants of our Western frontiers by the savages? It has been supposed by some that a part at least was chargeable upon our own inhabitants on the frontiers. Shall we, without having remonstrated, wage war with Great Britain? Surely we ought to demand satisfaction before we attempt to retaliate or make reprisals.

The Algerine war (he said) was another ground of complaint against Great Britain. It is said to have been brought about by her artifices. He was aware (he said) it would be unpopular to divert the resentment that had been excited on this account; but his situation made it his duty to examine the subject, which he had done, and could discover nothing in the conduct of Great Britain in this business which was inconsistent with the Law of Nations; and, although the United States may feel a present smart, yet we ought not to let our momentary feelings lead us to a decision which may be attended with serious consequences. Great Britain is, and for a long time has been, in close alliance and friendship with Portugal and Holland. They are in some measure dependent on her. They are now combined in one common cause against France. Great Britain, therefore, in making a truce with the Algerines, for Portugal and Holland, has done no more than to set her allies free from the depredations of pirates, in order that the whole force of those nations might be in a better situation to be called into action, if necessary, against their common enemy. Were either of these nations under any obligation to block up the Algerines for us? It is true, we suffer by it, but have we any right to complain? There is no evidence that Great Britain was influenced by motives hostile to us; other reasons can be assigned for her conduct; and shall we, without pretty strong evidence, adopt measures by way of retaliation, and that, too, before we have called on Great Britain for an explanation of her conduct? When the Representatives of the People of the United States are called upon to decide a question of such importance to the peace and happiness of this country, they ought to divest themselves of all resentful feelings; and, even supposing Great Britain has violated the treaty, and done us all the injuries complained of, ought we not to exercise moderation, and begin by remonstrating? Then, if she would not do us justice, and redress our wrongs, he would be as ready as any member to vindicate the honor of his country, but was not for precipitating measures in such a manner as would be condemned by the impartial world.

Another complaint has been stated, respecting the depredations committed on our commerce by British privateers. It is doubtless true that those excesses had been carried to great lengths. It was also in evidence that some of the British Courts of law had offered redress, and given ample damages. Perhaps other instances may be attended with like success; but, on this head, as well as the former items of complaint, there had been no proper demand made by the Executive of the United States, and there had not yet been time for us reasonably to expect either an answer or satisfaction. Privateering (he said) was a sort of piracy, and he wished it was abolished in all wars among civilized nations; but, as long as it is permitted, neutral Powers must expect to suffer more or less inconvenience and injury. There have been depredations committed by the subjects of every nation, on particular occasions, that could not be justified, and which it was not in their power to restrain. France, as well as Great Britain, may be charged with like injuries; and the United States would not be exempted from such a charge. Our privateers frequently did the same thing when we were in a state of war. Indeed, we have found it difficult, in all instances, to restrain, even our frontier inhabitants from committing depredations upon the Indians; and yet we have not been disposed to have those excesses charged upon the United States.

Our flour trade to France is also interrupted. This (he said) he believed to be in violation of the Law of Nations. But what can we do when so many of the Powers of Europe are combined in this measure? If we should judge it prudent to seek redress, ought we not to follow the example set us more than a century ago by Denmark and Sweden, quoted for our imitation by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Giles,] which was, as will be found in the first article of their Convention, to send a spirited remonstrance, and, if that did not answer the purpose, then it would be time enough to take other measures to do ourselves justice. He expressed it as his decided opinion, that better measures might be adopted for obtaining redress than were contained in the resolutions on the table.

We will now consider what is to be the operation of these proposed measures, and if there is not a great degree of probability, and, indeed, almost a certainty that they will produce the effect that is intended, they ought not to be adopted? It is supposed they will operate in three ways upon Great Britain—first, by lessening our imports from Great Britain, and, by that means, throwing her manufacturers out of employ; secondly, by withholding our exports, and thereby starving her into compliance; and, thirdly, by injuring her navigation.

As to the first, this, above all others, was the most improper time for attempting a thing of the kind. Properly timing public measures was of great importance towards insuring success. It was not from the manufacturers, but the merchants, that we received our supplies in the first instance. It was a thing of no importance to the manufacturer whether the manufactures were imported into this country, or whether they were buried in the ocean, or whether they were sent to other nations.

As to our obtaining supplies from France, there was no probability of that. They have prohibited the exportation of their woollen cloths, to enable them to supply their domestic wants during the present war. All we could expect from them is silks, ribands, &c., which are by no means necessary to the United States. It is, therefore, altogether likely the British manufactures would still find their way into this country by a circuitous route; but, should this not be the case, would not the British merchants be able to find other markets at this time equal to our consumption?

The present convulsed state of France, and war in Europe, has taken off a multitude of hands from every occupation, and has destroyed many flourishing manufactories, which will, for the present, open a door for the manufactures of Great Britain. And even France will not hesitate to use such as she wants, if she cannot otherwise get a supply, as the people of the United States did during their Revolution, who went so far, in some instances, as to smuggle them in, in violation of the law; and there were some instances in which they were obtained for the use of the Army from within the British lines at New York under the sanction of the Government.

Germany, Spain, Holland, and other powers at war, will also afford a market for British goods; so that they will not be at a loss for a market, nor will their manufacturers be either starved or materially injured, and would have no other effect than to turn their trade into another channel. If the resolutions are to have their intended effect in this way, they must much lessen, if not wholly prevent, the importation of British manufactures. It would, therefore, be much preferable at once to adopt a non-importation agreement. Here he asked if it was in the power of the Government to carry such measures into execution?

The experience of 1774 ought to prevent our hastily adopting measures that might for a time stagnate, if not wholly interrupt, our trade. When our grain could not be exported, the consequence would be, it would bear a very low price, and the farmers would be left a prey to domestic speculation of those who might expect such measures could not last long. If we were to commence the conflict which the adoption of these resolutions would most probably bring on, he was apprehensive we should fall in the conflict, and it would end to our disadvantage.

It is said our exports are the necessities of life, and our imports are the superfluities, and, therefore, we can dictate our own terms, and Great Britain will be forced into a compliance. One gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Moore] grounded his whole argument on this supposition, which he finds to be fallacious. The opinion Mr. H. has of the candor of that gentleman induced him to hope he would give a different vote. With regard to our exports, being so necessary to the existence of Great Britain, (he observed,) that she exported flour, salted provisions, and almost every other article of food that we did; and it will not be pretended that tobacco was a necessary of life. He had never found it so, never having made any use of it. He viewed it as a luxury.

Our timber and naval stores are carried to Great Britain under protecting duties. These articles could be supplied from Sweden and Russia. Our rice was used as a luxury; our pot and pearl ashes would also be had from other markets. In short, there did not appear to be one article of our exports that appeared to be so much of a necessary of life to them as their manufactures, especially their coarser woollens, were to us in our cold climate. To the Northward they were absolutely a necessary of life. We were in as much danger of perishing with cold as with hunger; and we can do as well without food as without raiment. We manufactured all our wool, but that fell very short of affording a supply.

He would not admit that the West India possessions of Great Britain were wholly dependent on us for a supply of flour. If we withheld that article, they will get a supply from some other quarter. They did get a supply during our war; and, if our flour should become necessary for their existence, it would find its way there by a circuitous route. We should be obliged to sell to some other nation, to whom they could go for it, and it would not be in our power to prevent it.

It is said we can injure the navigation of Great Britain. Is it not more effectually in her power to injure ours? Suppose she was to do no more than we already have—that is, to put a greater tonnage on our vessels entering her ports than she does upon her own—should we not be the sufferers? Our exports being vastly more bulky than our imports, consequently much more shipping is necessary to carry them to market. The fact is, we derive mutual advantages from the intercourse, and it would be impolitic to do anything that should cut off or suddenly make any great change in the course of trade between the two countries. Great changes in our laws or commercial systems ought not to be adopted but in cases of apparent and very urgent necessity.

tion have manifested towards the United States and their offer to enter into a more intimate and close connexion, and to put our trade upon a more beneficial footing, has been urged as a reason why we should adopt resolutions that will favor the commerce and trade of France. On this account, he felt himself impelled, however painful might be the task, to take some notice of the political situation and proceedings of that nation. They admired the fervor of the French nation. He had Liberty—a cause to which he became an early votary; a cause in which he had risked his life, and would most cheerfully do it again, if necessary. He most sincerely wished France might succeed in establishing a free and happy Government; but he could not approve of some of the measures they were pursuing to obtain this end. Justice, humanity, forbid that we should approve of their leading to the block, in some instances, and, in others, disgracing, some of their best men, who stood foremost in the most perilous times—not for taking up arms against their country—not for a breach of duty, or betraying the cause in which they had embarked—but merely for differing in opinion from others as to the means of accomplishing the same object; an opinion which their duty to their country and constituents required them to advance and support. Are we to justify that conduct, which has brought to an ignominious death those patriots who have drawn their swords in defence of Liberty, and have upon the high places of the field successfully fought her battles? Surely not. Many other exceptionable measures might be pointed out, but he would proceed no further. He equally disapproved (he said) of the Combined Powers interfering in the internal affairs of France. Is it a proper time when things are in such an unnatural convulsed state to think of sitting down and forming commercial treaties or regulations with this nation? He disapproved of the idea of forming a closer alliance than already existed with a people who had so far transgressed the bounds of humanity, and more especially with those who had the power and took the lead in those measures. This, of all others, is not the time in which we ought to wish to alter either our commercial or political connexion with France, or indeed with any of the European nations. For this reason, it was equally imprudent and impolitic to embark in a commercial conflict with Great Britain. Our situation being detached from the European nations, we ought to avoid as much as possible all connexion with their politics or wars. Our own country ought to be the peculiar object of our attention, and his opposition to the resolutions on the table was grounded entirely on the regard which he had for what he supposed and believed to be the true interest of his country.

Mr. CLARK felt himself under the necessity of expressing a few words at this stage of the subject. He mentioned something of the influence that had been dreaded on our funds. But he was clear as to the evidence that Great Britain had kept our Western posts, that she had taken our vessels at sea, and that she was the cause of setting lose the Algerines, &c. The expectation of any favorable issue, from negotiating with Britain, he believed, was fallacious; and the adoption of Mr. Madison's resolutions would be severely felt by them, although they would be harmless to us. Some further duties ought to be laid on such articles as they can be added on; and this may be done without either injuring our funds or diminishing the revenue.

Three years ago, we were told of a commercial treaty, but just as Congress were rising, we were informed in a Report from the Secretary of State, that it was all at an end. The change of sentiments in the gentlemen from the Eastward was, to him, curious. Formerly they had declared that if the Southern members would agree, we would get our commerce under proper regulations; but now, when Southern gentlemen are willing, the opinions of the others are quite the reverse.

It has been argued that Britain had only acted towards the Algerines, as a nation in support of its own interest. Granted. So have we a right to take measures that will secure our trade; neither do we run any risk by it, and it is more a political than a commercial question, after all that has been said about it. The idea of remonstrating or negotiating with Britain, he viewed as the most likely to produce a war about the recovery of the Western posts; which he did not think worth redeeming with the blood of our citizens. He believed that it was the duty of members to agree to the resolutions proposed, and to increase the duties on several imports, especially as it might easily be done, without impairing the revenue.

Mr. GILBERT, from New York, rose with diffidence, he said, to discharge the duty owed to his constituents, by expressing his sentiments on this important question, although he would not profess to deliver anything new. He had heard all the arguments for and against the resolutions. He had listened to philippics, and encomiums, in regard to England and France, in which both passion and revenge were too conspicuous, and in his opinion quite incompatible with that degree of cool deliberation which the merits of the subject demanded.

If he understood them rightly, those resolutions were intended to produce a great alteration in the affairs of this country: such a transition he feared would not produce any advantages. In some cases any change may produce a better condition, and if this change was likely to produce the same effect, he would not refuse it his support. But, will the alteration now proposed better the commercial condition of the United States? He feared it would have a contrary effect; and at this time of general prosperity, he asked, whence arises the necessity for such a transition? Such a proposition, therefore, as is contained in the resolutions ought to be considered again and again before it be adopted, under the prosperous situation of the United States.

We had much faith in the maxim of leaving commerce and agriculture to regulate themselves. It was a maxim admitted in all ages, and even by the gentleman who introduced the resolutions.

There may possibly be exceptions to this maxim, which would establish another maxim equally good, and if the proposed system was founded on such exceptions, he would agree to it. But he believed that the discrimination intended, was not founded on the exceptions to those maxims. When it becomes necessary to discriminate, let it be done in favor of ourselves.

We are told that the great object of this Government is, to regulate our commerce by a proper system of discrimination. But the turn of European affairs may terminate in favor of that nation, against which this discrimination is directed. We are likewise told of the balance of trade being against us with Britain. He doubted, however, the rules on which the calculation had been made, and believed, that some of those rules ought to be exploded; for, in order to calculate the balance of our trade, we ought to take all the world into the account, Spain, Holland, &c. For his part, from all that he could collect, his judgment led him to resist the proposed system.

But, in the course of the debates, another complexion had been put upon commerce, than he had expected. She had been represented as a wolf and a lion; war and revenge were her attendants, and you must fight. You go to battle, to conquest, to fight and retire. Again, under this shape, the resolutions are contrary to his opinion. It would be better to enter into a formal declaration of war against Britain and the Algerines, &c., wherein we might charge Britain with having conducted herself towards us with the greatest enmity. Yet, are the facts to prove this unequivocal? No satisfactory evidence has been offered to prove, that the truce between Algiers and Portugal was effected by the British Cabinet; but they wanted to have the whole force of Portugal thrown into the scale of the combined Powers, and therefore they made a six months or some other term of a truce, for Portugal, in order to prevent their navy from being diverted from the main object of operating against France.

But, can this be taken as a declaration of war against America? He concluded, by declaring his opinion, that Mr. Madison's propositions were inadequate to the intentions of the mover; and, if adopted, he feared, would prove ruinous to the United States.

Mr. FINLEY said, that the new matter which had been introduced, and the change of aspect, under which the subject now appeared, induced him to rise once more. He was pleased to find that the resolutions were taken up on new principles. The opposition now comes from a quarter where navigation was formerly a favorite object, and when the fishery bill was to be the foundation of our commercial prosperity, by being a nursery for seamen, &c. But at this day we are told not to meddle with navigation, lest by giving too much encouragement to it, we may divert the labor of our young men from agriculture? I confess, said he, that I don't know on what ground this great change has been effected; because, if the encouragement of our navigation and commerce was a desirable object then, it must be evident, that it is more necessary now, when our commerce is suffering.

He said it was a national question, and all local interests ought to give place to it. He could not separate a commercial from a political question in the present case, for they seemed as much connected as light and heat, and were as essential to each other. Everything that concerns the national welfare, is a political question, nor could he take up the subject in any other view. It is alleged that a commercial treaty is improper, because we are a growing people; and having to deal with a people who already have commercial treaties. But some measures must be adopted. He was opposed to fleets and armies, yet, if we were amongst, and connected with the countries of Europe, we would be obliged to have both.

A gentleman from New Jersey had intimated that the United States had refused to comply with the treaty on their part. He wished the circumstance might not be hid, if it is so, let it be spoken out. He could not, however, subscribe to this assertion, for we have vindicated our honor by the proceedings in our Courts of Law, so that we cannot be charged with any open breach of the treaty unless by implication.

In reply to Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. F. made several observations in regard to Britain consulting her own interest, and he did not wish our discriminations to go any farther than our own interest would permit. He next adverted to what had already been often mentioned in the course of the debate of the evidences respecting the Western posts, the savages, and the Algerines. A gentleman from New Jersey had assured him two years ago that a treaty was then negotiating and would soon be finished, but it was not yet done.

Mr. DAYTON demanded to know to whom Mr. F. alluded. He replied that he meant Mr. BOUTWORT. This gentleman denied having given such information as Mr. F. mentioned, at least in that unqualified sense.

Mr. F. proceeded. He took notice of the severe observations that Mr. HILLHOUSE had made in regard to France. The decisions of that gentleman on this occasion, reminded him of the charges made against the white inhabitants of the Western frontiers, when the Indians were murdering them and their wives and children. It was asserted that the citizens of the West were the aggressors, and he had been obliged to vindicate their character. Several other remarks were made by Mr. F. His intentions in supporting the resolutions were similar to those of Mr. CLARK, viz.: not to wage war, but to prevent it. It is the interest of nations to promote the advantages of each other, but when we meet an unequivocal enemy in trade we are called on to do justice to ourselves. The means of supplying our citizens with domestic manufactures is within our power, although it cannot be done all at once.

The opposition to the resolutions, he observed, had taken a wider extent than was at first expected. He would have been better pleased, if a gentleman who spoke yesterday, [Mr. TRACY,] had used more candor, instead of ridicule, in his arguments. It had been denied that Britain depended so much on this country for supplies; yet, he would assert, that the industrious laborers in Manchester, were already in a state of the greatest distress by the war, and in Paisley, in Scotland, they were almost starving. So it was in many parts of Ireland. The consequence was, that the British army was increased, although the men entered into the service with reluctance.

He next took a view of the trade of Britain with this country. In 1775, America and the West Indies consumed one-third of their manufactures, and the consumption has been greater since that time. From these reasons, it was evident, that they would be the sufferers, were we to refuse their manufactures; and it is entirely in our power to do so, at least in such a degree as to regulate our own commerce.

A gentleman who was up yesterday from the Eastward, [Mr. DEXTER,] told us much of the peace and prosperity of the United States. If this be true, whence, then, do we hear the noise of war on all sides of us? The widow and the orphan murdered in the West, and our citizens carried into slavery from our vessels on the ocean?

One of the arguments he heard urged against our attempting to offend Britain, by any innovation in commercial regulations, was, that she was so strongly allied, it would be dangerous. She is so, but it is not probable that such alliances will be lasting.

The Governor of the Universe will not suffer the combined forces of Europe to crush Liberty; and it will not be long before those allied despots must break loose from their unnatural bonds, and all their national jealousies will return. From every consideration, he was of opinion, that the resolutions ought to be adopted, and that this country, although it could not do it in a day, yet, it ought to be preparing gradually, by giving encouragement to domestic manufactures, such as would eventually render us more independent in commercial transactions.

Gentlemen had spoken largely of the comparative trade of Britain and France, and we had heard a flourish about philippics and eulogiums, scenes of agitation and horror. But did the gentleman, who undertook to accuse Frenchmen, take into consideration their provocations? Have we ever read, or heard of any nation that was so much depressed and abused by its Government? No nation was ever so much abused—no nation ever had such a combination of power to contend with. No nation was ever so treacherously used by men in whom they had placed confidence—no nation ever suffered so much in the cause of liberty.

Again, he returned to consider the conduct of the United States in relation to Britain. We have been mild and patient. We have avoided to irritate them. Nor have we even fortified our posts on Lake Erie, or in Pennsylvania, and we looked for some faith in return. Yet what effect has there been produced? We know it to be a fact, that they have provoked the Indians against us, and that they have supplied them both with arms and rations. If they will pursue such measures as they pleases, for their own interest, ought we not to pursue measures for ours? He had no prejudice or objections against Englishmen, but to the tyrannical conduct of their Government, which has committed so many faults, first, in regard to the slave-trade, the navigation of the ocean, &c., &c., and lastly, in the injury done to the United States in depriving us of the benefits of the fur trade.

Appeals to their justice, and negotiations, have been proposed; but even on this ground what have we to expect from negotiation or remonstrance? Here he quoted several instances where this mode of treatment generally failed. Let us, therefore, appeal to their interest. It is allowed that the balance of trade is against us with Great Britain, whilst it is in our favor with every other nation.

In reply to some expressions of Mr. S. SMITH, Mr. F. said, that if he might be allowed to compare small with great things, although he would not himself be a great loser by the expense of entering the flag of his ships on the seas, yet he had his share of losses in the Revolution and was as much attached to the independence of his country as the most wealthy citizen in it; neither did he covet any of the gentleman's wealth to divide amongst his sons, being already in possession of such a comfortable portion of property as enabled him to live pretty nearly on an equality with his constituents.

With regard to the public funds, he could not see how the adoption of the resolutions would injure them. He believed that it would not; and although he had not from the first approved of the system of finance, yet he would be amongst those who would endeavor to pay off the Public Debt, even faster than the Funding System allowed, if it could be done. He did not, however, like to hear the Funding System always conjured up like a ghost in rivalry against every salutary measure, that could be suggested for the nation. It was a dangerous doctrine to set up the funds, and the interests of the country, as enemies to each other.

He took further notice of some forced arguments of a gentleman from the Eastward, [Mr. TRACY,] and he observed, that although merchants of the largest capitals might be supposed to have the least occasion for credit, yet experience shows that they avail themselves of credit as much as others. After a few additional remarks, Mr. F. concluded by declaring himself in favor of the resolutions, and that it was more necessary to adopt them now than two years ago; he hoped, therefore, that gentlemen would agree to consider that as the best time for doing it.

Mr. SMITH closed this day's debate by a short speech, principally intended to throw the arguments of Mr. F. FINDLEY and the resolutions of Mr. MADISON into ridicule. He went over the old ground of asserting that none of the products of the United States were necessities of life in Great Britain.

After he sat down, the Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

understand a more profitable one. Profit is a plain word, that cannot be misunderstood. We have, to speak in round numbers, $20,000,000 of exports annually. To have the trade of exports on a good footing, means nothing more than to sell them dear; and, consequently, the trade of import on a good footing, is to buy cheap. To put them both on a better footing, is to sell dearer and to buy cheaper than we do at present. If the effect of the resolutions will be to cause our exports to be sold cheaper and our imports to be bought dearer, our trade will suffer an injury.

It is hard to compute how great the injury would prove; for the first loss of value in the buying dear and selling cheap, is only the symptom and beginning of the evil, but by no means the measure of it. It will withdraw a great part of the nourishment that now supplies the wonderful growth of our industry and opulence. The difference may not amount to a great proportion of the price of the articles, but it may reach the greater part of the profit of the producer. It may have effects in this way, which will be of the worst kind, by discouraging the products of our land and industry. It is to this test I propose to bring the resolutions on the table. And if it shall clearly appear that they tend to cause our exports to be sold cheaper, and our imports to be bought dearer, they cannot escape condemnation. Whatever specious show of advantage may be given them, they deserve to be called aggravations of any real or supposed evils in our commercial system, and not remedies.

I have framed this statement of the question so as to comprehend the whole subject of debate, and at the same time I confess it was my design to exclude from consideration a number of topics which appear to me totally irrelevant to it.

The best answer to many assertions we have heard, is to admit them without proof. We are exhorted to assert our natural rights, to put trade on a respectable footing, to dictate terms of trade to other nations, to engage in a contest of self-de-mol, and by that, and by shifting our commerce from one country to another, to make our enemies feel the extent of our power. This language, as it respects the proper subject of discussion, means nothing, or what is worse. If our trade is already on a profitable footing, it is on a respectable one. Unless war be our object, it is useless to inquire, what are the dispositions of any Government with whose subjects our merchants deal to the best advantage. While they will smoke our tobacco, and eat our provisions, it is very immaterial, both to the consumer and the producer, what are the politics of the two countries, excepting so far as their quarrels may disturb the benefits of their mutual intercourse.

So far, therefore, as commerce is concerned, the inquiry is, have we a good market? The good or bad state of our actual market is the question. The actual market is everywhere more or less restricted one, and the natural order of things is displaced by the artificial. Most nations, for reasons of which they alone are the rightful judges, have regulated and restricted their intercourse according to their views of safety and profit. We claim for ourselves the same right, as the acts in our statute book and the resolutions on the table evince, without holding ourselves accountable to any other nation whatever. The right which we properly claim, and which we properly exercise when we do it prudently and usefully for our nation, is as well established, and has been longer in use in the countries of which we complain, than in our own. If their right is as good as that of Congress to regulate and restrict, why do we talk of a strenuous exertion of our force, and by dictating terms to nations who are fancied to be physically dependent on America, to change the policy of nations? It may be very true, that their policy is very wise and good for themselves, but not as favorable for us as we would make it, if we could legislate for both sides of the Atlantic.

The extravagant despotism of this language accords very ill with our power to give it effect, or with the affectation of zeal for an unlimited freedom of commerce. Such a state of absolute freedom of commerce never did exist, and it is very much to be doubted whether it ever will. Were I invested with the trust to legislate for mankind, it is very probable the first act of my authority would be to throw all the restrictive and prohibitory laws of trade into the fire; the resolutions on the table would not be spared. But if I were to do so, it is probable I should have a quarrel on my hands, with every civilized nation. The Dutch would claim the monopoly of the spice trade, for which their ancestors passed their whole lives in warfare. The Spanish and Portuguese would be no less obstinate. If we calculate what Colony monopolies have cost in wealth, in suffering, and in crimes, we should say they were dearly purchased. The English would plead for their Navigation Act, not as a source of gain, but as an essential mean of securing their independence. So many interests would be disturbed, and so many lost, by a violent change from the existing, to an unknown order of things, and the mutual relations of nations, in respect to their power and wealth, would suffer such a shock, that the idea must be allowed to be perfectly Utopian and wild. But for this country to form the project of changing the policy of nations, and to begin the abolition of restrictions by restrictions of its own, is equally ridiculous and inconsistent.

Let every nation that is really disposed to extend the liberty of commerce, beware of rash and hasty schemes of prohibition. In the affairs of trade, as in most others, we make too many laws. We follow experience too little, and the visions of theorists a great deal too much. Instead of listening to discourses on what the market ought to be, and what the schemes, which always promise much on paper, pretend to make it, let us see what is the actual market for our exports and imports. This will bring vague assertions and sanguine opinions to the test of experience. That rage for theory and system, which would entangle even practical truth in the web of the brain, is the poison of public discussion. One fact is better than two systems.

H. or R.]

Commerce of the United States.

[JANUARY, 1794.]

The terms on which our exports are received in the British market, have been accurately examined by a gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAM SMITH.) Before his statement of facts was made to the committee, it was urged, and with no little warmth, that the system of England indicated her inveteracy towards this country, while that of France, springing from disinterested affection, constituted a claim for gratitude and self-denying measures of retribution.

Since that statement, however, that romantic style, which is so ill adapted to the subject, has been changed. We hear it insinuated, that the comparison of the footing of our exports in the markets of France and England, is of no importance; that it is chiefly our object to see how we may assist and extend our commerce. This evasion of the force of the statement, or rather this indirect admission of its authority, establishes it. It will not be pretended that it has been shaken during the debate.

It has been made to appear, beyond contradiction, that the British market for our exports, taken in the aggregate, is a good one—that it is better than the French, and better than any we have, and, for many of our products, the only one.

The whole amount of our exports to the British Dominions in the year ending the 30th of September, 1790, was $9,246,660. But it will be more simple and satisfactory to confine the inquiry to the articles following: bread-stuff, tobacco, rice, wood, the produce of the fisheries, fish oil, pot and pearl ashes, salted meats, indigo, live animals, flaxseed, naval stores, and iron.

The amount of the before-mentioned articles exported in that same year to the British Dominions, was $3,457,173.

Mr. A. went into a consideration of the footing on which they are received. He then said, we have heard so much of restriction, of iniquity and jealous prohibitions to cramp our trade, it is natural to scrutinize the British system, with the expectation of finding little besides the effects of her selfish and angry policy.

Yet, of the great sum of nearly eight millions and a half, the amount of the products before mentioned sold in her markets, two articles only are duties by way of restriction. Bread stuff is dutied so high in the market of Great Britain, as in times of plenty to exclude it, and this is done from the desire to favor her own farmers. The mover of the resolutions justified the exclusion of our bread stuff from the French West Indies by their permanent regulations, because he said they were bound to prefer their own products to those even of the United States. It would seem that the same apology would do for England, in her home market. But what will do for the vindication of one nation becomes invective against another. The criminal nation, however, receives our bread-stuff in the West Indies free, and excludes other foreign, so as to give our producers the monopoly of the supply. This is no merit, in the judgment of the mover of the resolutions, because it is a fragment of her old Colony system. Notwithstanding the nature of the duties on breadstuffs in Great Britain, it has been clearly shown that she is a better customer for that article in Europe, than her neighbor, France. The latter, in ordinary times, is a poor customer for breadstuffs, for the same reason that our own country is, because she produces it herself, and therefore France permits it to be imported, and the United States do the like. Great Britain often wants the article, and then she receives it; no country can be expected to buy what it does not want. The breadstuffs sold in the European Dominions of Great Britain in the year 1790, amounted to $1,087,840.

Wheat oil pays the heavy duty of eighteen pounds three shillings sterling per ton; yet spermacei oil found a market there to the value of $81,048. Thus it appears that, of eight millions and a half sold to Great Britain and her Dominions, only the value of one million one hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars was under duty of a restrictive nature. The breadstuffs is hardly to be considered as within the description, yet to give the argument its full force, what is it? about one-eighth part is restricted. To proceed with the residue:

Indigo, to the amount of	$473,830
Live animals to the West Indies	62,415
Flax seed to Great Britain	219,924
Total	756,169

These articles are received duty free, which is a good foot to the trade. Yet, we find, good as it is, the bulk of our exports is received on even better terms.

Flour to the British West Indies	$858,098
Grain	273,805
Free, while other foreign flour and grain is prohibited.
Tobacco to Great Britain	2,754,493
Tobacco to the West Indies	22,816
1s. 3d. sterling, duty—3s. 6d. on other foreign Tobacco.
In the West Indies other foreign tobacco is prohibited.
Rice to Great Britain	773,852
7s. 4d. per cwt. duty—8s. 10d. on other foreign rice.
To the West Indies
Other foreign rice prohibited.
Wood, to Great Britain	180,077
Free—higher duties on other foreign.
To the West Indies	240,174
Free—other foreign prohibited.
Pot and pearl ashes	382,481
Free—2s. 3d. on other foreign, equal to $10 per ton.
Naval stores, to Great Britain	747,078
Higher duties on other foreign.
To the West Indies	190,670
Free—other foreign prohibited.
Iron, to Great Britain	6,162
Free—duties on other foreign.
	81,612
Total	6,510,926

Thus it appears, that nearly seven-eighths of the exports to the British Dominions are received on terms of positive favor. Foreigners, our rivals in the sale of these articles, are either absolutely shut out of their market by prohibitions, or discouraged in their competition with us by higher duties. There is some restriction, it is admitted, but there is, to balance it, a large amount received duty free. The above surplus of six millions and a half goes to the account of privilege and favor. This is better than she treats any other foreign nation; it is better, indeed, than she treats her own subjects; because they are, by this means, deprived of a free and open market; it is better than our footing with any nation with whom we have treaties. It has been demonstrated that it is better than the footing on which France receives either the like articles, or the aggregate of our products. The best proof in the world is, that they are not sent to France; the merchants will find out the best market sooner than we shall.

The footing of our exports under the British system, is better than that of their exports to the United States, under our system. Nay, it is better than the freedom of commerce, which is one of the visions for which our solid prosperity is to be hazarded; for, suppose we could batter down her system of prohibitions and restrictions, it would be gaining a loss: one-eighth is restricted, and more than six-eighths has restrictions in its favor. It is as plain as figures can make it, that if a state of freedom for our exports is at par, the present system raises them, in point of privilege, above par. To suppose that we can terrify them by these resolutions to abolish their restrictions, and at the same time to maintain in our favor their duties, to exclude other foreigners from their market, is too absurd to be refuted.

We have heard that the market of France is the great centre of our interests; we are to look to her, and not to England, for advantages. Being, as the style of theory is, our best customer and best friend, showing to our trade particular favor and privilege, while England manifests in her system such narrow and selfish views, it is strange to remark such a pointed refutation of assertions and opinions by facts. The amount sent to France herself is very trivial; either our merchants are ignorant of the best markets, or those which they prefer are the best; and, if the English markets, in spite of the alleged ill usage, are still preferred to the French, it is a proof of the superior advantages of the former over the latter. The arguments I have adverted to, oblige those who urge them to make a greater difference in favor of the English, than the true state of facts will warrant. Indeed, if they persist in their arguments, they are bound to deny their own conclusions. They are bound to admit this position: if France receives little of such of our products as Great Britain takes on terms of privilege and favor, because of that favor it allows the value of that favored footing. If France takes little of our articles, because she does not want them, it shows the absurdity of looking to her as the best customer.

It may be said, and truly, that Great Britain regards only her own interest in these arguments.

So much the better. If it is her interest to afford to our commerce more encouragement than France gives, if she does this when she is inveterate against us, as it is alleged, and when we are indulging an avowed hatred towards her, and partiality towards France, it shows that we have very solid grounds to rely on. Her interest is, according to this statement, stronger than our passions, stronger than her own, and is the more to be depended on, as it cannot be put to any more trying experiment in future. The good will and friendship of nations are hollow foundations to build our systems upon. Mutual interest is a bottom of rock. The fervor of transient sentiments is not better than straw or stubble. Some gentlemen have lamented this distrust of any relation between nations except an interested one. But the substitution of any other principle could produce little else than the hypocrisy of sentiment, and an instability of affairs. It would be relying on what is not stable, instead of what is; it would introduce into politics the jargon of romance. It is in this sense, and this only, that the word favor is used: a state of things so arranged as to produce our profit and advantage, though intended by Great Britain merely for her own. The disposition of a nation is immaterial; the fact that we profit by their system cannot be so to this discussion.

The next point is, to consider whether our imports are on a good footing, or, in other words, whether we are in a situation to buy what we have occasion for at a cheap rate. In this view, the systems of the commercial nations are not to be complained of, as all are desirous of selling the products of their labor. Great Britain is not censured in this respect. The objection is rather of the opposite kind, that we buy too cheap, and therefore consume too much, and that we take not only as much as we can pay for, but to the extent of our credit also. There is less freedom of importation, however, from the West Indies. In this respect, France is more restrictive than England; for the former allows the exportation to us of only rum and molasses, while England admits that of sugar, coffee, and other principal West India products. Yet, even here, when the preference seems to be decidedly due to the British system, occasion is taken to extol that of the French. We are told that they sell us the chief part of the molasses which is consumed or manufactured into rum, and that a great and truly important branch, the distillery, is kept up by their liberality in furnishing the raw material. There is at every step matter to confirm the remark, that nations have framed their regulations to suit their own interests, not ours. France is a great brandy manufacturer. She will not admit rum, therefore, even from her own islands, because it would supplant the consumption of brandy. The molasses was for that reason some years ago of no value in her islands, and was not even saved in casks. But the demand from America soon raised its value. The policy of England has been equally selfish. The molasses is distilled in her islands, because she has no manufacture of brandy to suffer by its sale.

A question remains respecting the state of our navigation. If we pay no regard to the regulations of foreign nations, and ask whether this valuable branch of our industry and capital is in a distressed and sickly state, we shall find that it is in a strong and flourishing condition. If the quantity of shipping was declining, if it was unemployed, even at low freight, I should say it must be sustained and encouraged. No such thing is asserted. Seamen's wages are high, freights are high, and American bottoms in full employment. But the complaint is, our vessels are not permitted to go to the British West Indies. It is even affirmed, that to civilized countries treat us so ill in that respect. Spain and Portugal prohibit the traffic to their possessions, not only in our vessels, but in their own, which, according to the style of the resolutions, is worse treatment than we meet with from the British. It is also asserted, and on as bad ground, that our vessels are excluded from most of the British markets. This is not true, in any sense. We are admitted into the greater number of her ports, in our own vessels; and by far the greater value of our exports is sold in British ports, into which our vessels are received, not only on a good footing, compared with other foreigners, but on terms of positive favor—on better terms than British vessels are admitted into our own ports. We are not subject to the alien duties; and the light money, &c., of 1s. 9d. sterling, per ton, is less than our foreign tonnage duty, not to mention the ten per cent. on the duties on the goods in foreign bottoms. But in the port of London, our vessels are received free. It is for the unprejudiced mind to compare these facts with the assertions we have heard so confidently and so feelingly made by the mover of the resolutions, that we are excluded from most of their ports, and that no civilized nation treats our vessels so ill as the British.

The tonnage of the vessels employed between Great Britain and her dependencies and the United States, is called two hundred and twenty thousand, and the whole of this is represented as our just right. The same gentleman speaks of our natural right to the carriage of our own articles, and that we may and ought to insist upon our equitable share. Yet, soon after, he uses the language of monopoly, and represents the whole carriage of imports and exports as the proper object of our efforts, and all that others carry as a clear loss to us. If an equitable share of the carriage means half, we have it already, and more, and our proportion is rapidly increasing. If anything is meant by the natural right of carriage, one would imagine that it belongs to him, whoever he may be, who having bought our produce, and made himself the owner, thinks proper to take it with him to his own country. It is neither our policy nor our design to check the sale of our produce; we invite every description of purchasers, because we expect to sell dearest when the number and competition of the buyers is the greatest. For this reason, the total exclusion of foreigners and their vessels from the purchase and carriage of our exports is an advantage, in respect to navigation.

gation, which has a disadvantage to balance it, in respect to the price of produce. It is with this reserve we ought to receive the remark, that the carriage of our exports should be our object rather than that of our imports. By going with our vessels into foreign ports, we buy our imports in the best market. By giving a steady and moderate encouragement to our own shipping, without pretending violently to interrupt the course of business, experience will soon establish that order of things which is most beneficial to the exporter, the importer, and the ship owner. The best interest of agriculture is the true interest of trade.

In a trade mutually beneficial, it is strangely absurd to consider the gain of others as our loss. Admitting it, however, for argument sake, yet it should be noticed that the loss of two hundred and twenty thousand tons of shipping is computed according to the apparent tonnage. Our vessels not being allowed to go to the British West Indies, and their vessels making frequent voyages, appear in the entries over and over again. In the trade to the European Dominions of Great Britain, the distance being greater, our vessels are not so often entered. Both these circumstances give a false show to the amount of British tonnage, compared with the American. It is, however, very pleasing to the mind, to see that our tonnage exceeds the British in the European trade. For various reasons, some of which will be mentioned hereafter, the tonnage in the West India trade is not the proper subject of calculation. In the European comparison, we have more tonnage in the British than in the French commerce; it is, indeed, more than four to one. The great quantity of British tonnage, employed in our trade, is also, in a great measure, owing to the large capitals of the merchants employed in the buying and exporting our productions. If we would banish the ships, we must strike at the root, and banish the capital; and this, before we have capital of our own grown up to replace it, would be an operation of no little violence and injury, to our Southern brethren especially. Independently of this circumstance, Great Britain is an active and intelligent rival in the navigation line. Her ships are dearer, and the provisioning of her seamen is perhaps rather dearer than ours; on the other hand, the rate of interest is lower in England, and so are seamen's wages. It would be improper, therefore, to consider the amount of British tonnage in our trade as a proof of a bad state of things, arising either from the restrictions of that Government, or the negligence or timidity of this. We are to charge it to causes which are more connected with the natural competition of capital and industry; causes which, in fact, retarded the growth of our shipping more when we were Colonies and our ships were free, than since the adoption of the present Government.

It has been said, with emphasis, that the Constitution grew out of the complaints of the nation respecting commerce, especially that with the British Dominions. What was then lamented by our patriots? Feebleness of the public Councils, the shadow of union, and scarce the shadow of public credit—every where despondency—the pressure of evils not only great, but portentous of civil dissensions. These were the grievances; and what more was then desired than their remedies? Is it possible to survey this prosperous country, and to assert that they have been delayed? Trade flourishes on our wharves, although it droops in speeches. Manufactures have risen, under the shade of protecting duties, from almost nothing, to such a state that we are even told it is safe to depend on the domestic supply, if the foreign should cease. The fisheries, which we found in decline, are in the most vigorous growth. The whale fishery, which our allies would have transferred to Dunkirk, now traverses the whole ocean: to that hardy race of men, the sea is but a park for hunting its monsters; such is their activity, the deepest abysses scarcely afford to their prey a hiding place. Look around, and see how the frontier circle widens, how the interior improves, and let it be repeated, that the hopes of the people, when they formed this Constitution, have been frustrated!

But if it should happen that our prejudices prove stronger than our senses; if it should be believed that our farmers and merchants see their products and ships and wharves going to decay together, and they are ignorant or silent on their own ruin, still the public documents would not disclose so alarming a state of our affairs. Our imports are obtained so plentifully and cheaply, that one of the avowed objects of the resolution is, to make them scarcer and dearer. Our exports, so far from languishing, have increased two millions of dollars in a year. Our navigation is found to be augmented beyond the most sanguine expectation. We hear of the vast advantage the English derive from the Navigation Act, and we are asked, in a tone of accusation, Shall we sit still, and do nothing? Who is bold enough to say, Congress has done nothing for the encouragement of American navigation? To counteract the Navigation Act, we have laid on British a higher tonnage than our own vessels pay in their ports; and, what is much more effectual, we have imposed ten per cent. on the duties, when the duties articles are borne in foreign bottoms. We have also made the coasting trade a monopoly to our own vessels. Let those who have asserted that this is nothing, compare facts with the regulations which produced them:

Is not this increase of American shipping rapid enough? Many persons say it is too rapid, and attracts too much capital for the circumstances of the country. I cannot readily persuade myself to think so valuable a branch of employment thrives too fast. But a steady and sure encouragement is more to be relied on than violent methods of forcing its growth. It is not clear that the quantity of our navigation, including our coasting and fishing vessels, is less, in proportion to those of that nation. In that computation, we shall probably find that we are already more a navigating people than the English. As this is a growing country, we have the most stable ground of dependence on the corresponding growth of our navigation; and that the increasing demand for shipping will rather fall to the share of Americans than foreigners, is not to be denied. We did expect this, from the nature of our own laws; we have been confirmed in it by experience; and we know that an American bottom is actually preferred to a foreign one. In cases where one partner is an American and another a foreigner, the ship is made an American bottom. A fact of this kind overthrows a whole theory of reasoning on the necessity of further restrictions. It shows that the work of restriction is already done.

If we take the aggregate view of our commercial interests, we shall find much more occasion for satisfaction, and even exultation, than complaint, and none for despondency. It would be too bold to say that our condition is so eligible there is nothing to be wished. Neither the order of nature nor the allotments of Providence afford perfect content, and it would be absurd to expect in our politics what is denied in the laws of our being. The nations with whom we have intercourse have, without exception, more or less restricted their commerce. They have framed their regulations to suit their real or fancied interests. The code of France is as full of restrictions as that of England. We have regulations of our own, and they are unlike those of any other country. Inasmuch as the interests and circumstances of nations vary so essentially, the project of an exact reciprocity on our part is a vision. What we desire is, to have, not an exact reciprocity, but an intercourse of mutual benefit and convenience. It has scarcely been so much as insinuated that the change contemplated will be a profitable one—that it will enable us to sell dearer and to buy cheaper; on the contrary, we are invited to submit to the hazards and losses of a conflict with our customers—to engage in a contest of self-denial. For what? To obtain better markets? No such thing; but to shut up, forever, if possible, the best market we have for our exports, and to confine ourselves to the dearest and scarcest markets for our imports; and this is to be done for the benefit of trade, or, as it is sometimes more correctly said, for the benefit of France. This language is not a little inconsistent and strange from those who recommend a non-importation agreement, and who think we should even renounce the sea, and devote ourselves to agriculture. Thus, to make our trade more free, it is to be embarrassed and violently shifted from one country to another; not according to the interest of the merchants, but the visionary theories and capricious rashness of the legislators. To make trade better, it is to be made nothing.

So far as commerce and navigation are regarded, the pretences for this contest are confined to two. We are not allowed to carry manufactured articles to Great Britain, nor any products, except of our own growth, and we are not permitted to go, with our own vessels, to the West Indies. The former, which is a provision of the Navigation Act, is of little importance to our interests, as our trade is chiefly a direct one; our shipping not being equal to the carrying for other nations; and our manufactured articles are not furnished in quantities for exportation, and if they were, Great Britain would not be a customer. So far, therefore, the restriction is rather nominal than real. The exclusion of our vessels from the West Indies is of more importance. When we propose to make an effort to force a privilege from Great Britain, which she is loth to yield to us, it is necessary to compare the value of the object with the effort, and, above all, to calculate very warily the probability of success. A trivial thing deserves not a great exertion; much less ought we to stake a very great good in possession for a slight chance of a less good. The carriage of one half the exports and imports to and from the British West Indies, is the object to be contended for. Our whole exports to Great Britain are to be hazarded. We sell on terms of privilege and positive favor, as it has been abundantly shown, near seven millions to the Dominions of Great Britain. We are to risk the privilege in this great amount—for what? For the freight only of one half the British West India trade with the United States. It belongs to commercial men to calculate the entire value of the freight alluded to; but it cannot bear much proportion to the amount of seven millions. Besides, if we are denied the privilege of carrying our articles in our vessels to the islands, we are on a footing of privilege in the sale of them. We have one privilege, if not two. It is readily admitted that it is a desirable thing to have our vessels allowed to go to the English islands, but the value of the object has its limits; and we go unquestionably beyond them, when we throw our whole exports into confusion, and run the risk of losing our best markets, for the sake of forcing a permission to carry our own products to one of those markets; in which, too, it should be noticed, we sell much less than we do to Great Britain herself. If to this we add, that the success of the contest is grounded on the sanguine and passionate hypothesis of our being able to starve the islanders, which, on trial, may prove false, and which our being involved in the war would overthrow at once, we may conclude, without going further into the discussion, that prudence forbids our engaging in the hazards of a commercial war; that great things should not be stated against such as are of much less value; that what we possess should not be risked for what we desire, without great odds in our favor; still less, if the chance is infinitely against us.

If these considerations should fail of their effect, it will be necessary to go into an examination of the tendency of the system of discrimination to redress and avenge all our wrongs, and to realize all our hopes.

It has been avowed that we are to look to France, not to England, for advantages in trade; we are to show our spirit, and to manifest towards those who are called enemies the spirit of enmity, and towards those we call friends something more than passive good will; we are to take active measures to force trade out of its accustomed channels, and to shift it by such means from England to France. The care of the concerns of the French manufacturers may be left, perhaps, as well in the hands of the Convention, as to be usurped into our own. However our zeal might engage us to interpose, our duty to our own immediate constituents demands all our attention. To volunteer it, in order to excite competition in one foreign nation to supplant another, is a very strange business; and to do it, as it has been irresistibly proved it will happen, at the charge and cost of our own citizens, is a thing equally beyond all justification and all example. What is it but to tax our own people for a time, perhaps for a long time, in order that the French may at last sell as cheap as the English?—cheaper they cannot, nor is it so much as pretended. The tax will be a loss to us, and the fancied tendency of it not a gain to this country, in the event, but to France. We shall pay more for a time, and in the end pay no less; for no object but that one nation may receive our money instead of the other. If this is generous towards France, it is not just to America; it is sacrificing what we owe to our constituents, to what we pretend to feel towards strangers. We have indeed heard a very ardent profession of gratitude to that nation, and infinite reliance seems to be placed on her readiness to sacrifice her interest to ours. The story of this generous strife should be left to ornament fiction. This is not the form nor the occasion to discharge our obligations of any sort to any foreign nation; it concerns not our feelings but our interests, yet the debate has often soared high above the smoke of business into the epic region. The market for tobacco, tar, turpentine and pitch, has become matter of sentiment, and given occasion alternately to rouse our courage and our gratitude.

If, instead of hexameters, we prefer discussing our relation to foreign nations in the common language, we shall not find that we are bound by treaty to establish a preference in favor of the French. The treaty is founded on a professed reciprocity—favor for favor. Why is the principle of treaty or no treaty made so essential, when the favor we are going to give is an act of supererogation? It is not expected by one of the nations in treaty; for Holland has declared, in her treaty with us, that such preferences are the fruitful source of animosity, embarrassment, and war. The French have set no such example. They discriminate, in their late Navigation Act, not as we are exhorted to do, between nations in treaty and not in treaty, but between nations at war and not at war with them; so that, when peace takes place, England will stand by that act on the same ground with ourselves

Mr. AMES proceeded to show, that if we expect by giving favor to get favor in return, it is improper to make a law. The business belongs to the Executive, in whose hands the Constitution has placed the power of dealing with foreign nations. He noticed its singularity to negotiate legislatively—to make by a law half a bargain, expecting a French law would make the other. He remarked that the footing, of treaty or no treaty, was different from the ground taken by the mover himself in supporting his system. Nations not said favor for favor was principle. Nations not in treaty grant favors—those in treaty restrict our trade. Yet the principle of discriminating in favor of nations in treaty, was not only inconsistent with the declared doctrine of the mover and with facts, but it is inconsistent with itself. Nations not in treaty are so very unequally operated upon by the resolutions, it is absurd to refer them to one principle. Spain and Portugal have no treaties with us, and are not disposed to have. Spain would not accede to the treaty of commerce between us and France, though she was invited; Portugal would not sign a treaty after it had been discussed and signed on our part. They have few ships or manufactures, and do not feed their Colonies from us; of course there is little for the discrimination to operate upon. The operation on nations in treaty is equally a satire on the principle of discrimination. Sweden, with whom we have a treaty, duties rise higher, if borne in our bottoms, than in her own. France does the like, in respect to tobacco, two and a half lives the quintal, which in effect prohibits our vessels to freight tobacco, as the duty is more than the freight. He then remarked on the French Navigation Act, the information of which had been given to the House since the debate began. He said the mover had, somewhat unluckily, proposed to except from this system nations having no Navigation Acts, in which case France would become the subject of unfriendly discrimination as well as Great Britain.

He remarked on the disposition of England to settle a commercial treaty, and adverted to the known desire of the Marquis of Lansdowne, (then Prime Minister,) in 1783, to form such an one on the most liberal principles. The history of that business, and the causes which prevented its conclusion, ought to be made known to the public. The powers given to our Ministers were revoked, and yet we hear that no such disposition on the part of Great Britain has existed. The declaration of Mr. Pitt in Parliament, in June, 1792, as well as the correspondence with Mr. Hammond, show a desire to enter upon a negotiation. The statement of the report on the privileges and restrictions of our commerce, that Great Britain has shown no inclination to meddle with the subject, seems to be incorrect. After tracing the operation of the resolution on different nations, he examined the supposed tendency to dispose Great Britain to settle an equitable treaty with this country. He asked whether those who held such language towards that nation as he heard, could be supposed to desire a treaty and friendly connexion? It seemed to be thought a merit to express hatred. It is common and natural to desire to annoy and to crush those whom we hate, but it is somewhat singular to pretend that the design of our anger is to embrace them. The tendency of angry measures to friendly dispositions and arrangements is not obvious. We affect to believe that we shall quarrel ourselves into their good will—that we shall beat a new path to peace and friendship with Great Britain, one that is grown up with thorns, and lined with men-traps and spring-guns. It should be called the war-path.

To do justice to the subject, its promised advantages should be examined. Exciting the competition of the French is to prove an advantage to this country, by opening a new market with that nation. This is scarcely intelligible. If it means anything, it is an admission that their market is not a good one, or that they have not taken measures to favor our traffic with them. In either case our system is absurd. The balance of trade is against us, and in favor of England. But the resolutions can only aggravate the evil, for, by compelling us to buy dearer and sell cheaper, the balance will be turned still more against our country. Neither is the supply from France less the aliment of luxury than that from England. Their excess of credit is an evil which we pretend to cure: by checking the natural growth of our own capital, which is the undoubted tendency of restraining trade, the progress of the remedy is thus delayed. If we will trade, there must be capital. It is best to have it of our own; if we have it not, we must depend on credit. Wealth springs from the profits of employment, and the best writers on the subject establish it, that employment is in proportion to the capital that is to excite and reward it.

To strike off credit, which is the substitute for capital, if it were possible to do it, would so far stop employment. Fortunately, it is not possible; the activity of individual industry eludes the misjudging power of Governments. The resolutions would, in effect, increase the demand for credit, as our products being bought dearer, there would be less money and more need of it. Necessity would produce credit. Where the laws are strict, it will soon find its proper level; the uses of credit will remain, and the evil will disappear.

But the whole theory of balances of trade, of helping it by restraint, and protecting it by systems of prohibition and restriction against foreign nations, as well as the remedy for credit, are among the exploded dogmas which are equally refuted by the maxims of science and the authority of time. Many such topics have been advanced which were known to exist as prejudices, but were not expected as arguments. It seems to be believed that the liberty of commerce is of some value. Although there are restrictions on one side, there will be some liberty left; counter restrictions, by diminishing that liberty, are in their nature aggravations, and not remedies. We complain of the British restrictions as of a millstone; our own system will be another, so that our trade

On the whole, the resolutions contain two great principles. To control trade by law, instead of leaving it to the better management of the merchants; and the principle of a sumptuary law. To play the tyrant in the counting-house, and in directing the private expenses of our citizens, are employments equally unworthy of discussion.

Besides the advantages of the system, we have been called to another view of it, and which seems to have less connexion with the merits of the discussion. The acts of States and the votes of public bodies, before the Constitution was adopted, and the votes of the House since, have been stated as grounds for our assent to this measure at this time. To help our own trade, to repel any real or supposed attack upon it, cannot fail to prepossess the mind; accordingly, the first feelings of every man yield to this proposition. But the sober judgment on the tendency and reasonableness of the interference of Government; often does, and probably ought still oftener, to change our impressions. On a second view of the question, the man who voted formerly for restrictions may say, much has been done under the new Constitution, and the good effects are yet making progress. The necessity of measures of counter restriction will appear to him much less urgent, and their efficacy in the present turbulent state of Europe infinitely less to be relied on. Far from being inconsistent in his conduct, consistency will forbid his pressing the experiment of his principle under circumstances which baffle the hopes of its success. But if so much stress is laid on former opinions in favor of this measure, how happens it that there is so little on that which now appears against it. Not one merchant has spoken in favor of it in this body; not one navigating or commercial State has patronized it.

Mr. Aves then entered pretty fully into the consideration of the absolute dependence of the British West India islands on our supplies. He admitted that they cannot draw them so well and so cheap from any other quarter; but this is not the point. Are they physically dependent? Can we starve them? And may we reasonably expect thus to dictate to Great Britain a free admission of our vessels into her islands? He went into details to prove the negative. Beef and pork sent from the new United States to the British West Indies, 1773, 14,993 barrels. In the war time, 1780, ditto from England, 17,795. At the end of the war, 1783, 16,526. Ireland exported, on an average of seven years, prior to 1777, 250,000 barrels. Salted fish the English take in abundance, and prohibit it from us. Butter and cheese from England and Ireland are but lately banished even from our markets. Exports from the new United States, 1773: horses, 2,768; cattle, 1,203; sheep and hogs, 5,320. Twenty-two years prior to 1791, were exported from England to all parts, 29,131 horses. Ireland, on an average of seven years, to 1779, exported 4,040 live stock, exclusive of hogs. The coast of Barbary, the Cape de Verdes, &c., supply sheep and cattle. The islands, since the war, have increased their domestic supplies to a great degree. The new United States exported about 130,000 barrels of flour in 1773 to the West Indies; Ireland, by grazing less, could supply wheat; England also usually exports it, she also imports from Archangel. Sicily and the Barbary States furnish wheat in abundance.

We are deceived when we fancy we can starve foreign countries. France is reckoned to consume grain at the rate of seven bushels to each soul: twenty-six millions of souls, the quantity 182 millions of bushels. We export, to speak in round numbers, five or six millions of bushels to all the different countries which we supply; a trifle, this, to their wants. Frugality is a greater resource. Instead of seven bushels, perhaps two could be saved by stinting the consumption of the food of cattle, or by the use of other food. Two bushels saved to each soul, is fifty-two millions of bushels, a quantity which, the whole trading world perhaps could not furnish. Rice is said to be prohibited by Spain and Portugal to favor their own. Brazil could supply their rice instead of ours. Lumber—he has stated the danger of despising Canada and Nova Scotia too much as rivals in the West India supply, especially the former. The dependence the English had placed on them some years ago had failed, partly because we entered into competition with them on very superior terms, and partly because they were then in an infant state. They are now supposed to have considerably more than doubled their numbers since the peace; and if, instead of having us for competitors for the supply, as before, we should shut ourselves out by refusing our supplies or being refused entry for them, those two Colonies would rise from the ground: at least we should do more to bring it about than the English Ministry had been able to do. In 1772, 679 vessels, the actual tonnage of which was one hundred and twenty-eight thousand, were employed in the West India trade from Great Britain. They were supposed, on good ground, to be but half freighted to the islands; they might carry lumber, and the freight supposed to be deficient would be, at 40s. sterling the ton, £128,000. This sum would diminish the extra charge of carrying lumber to the islands. But is lumber to be had? Yes, in Germany, and from the Baltic. It is even cheaper in Europe than our own. Besides which, the hard woods used in mills are abundant in the islands. We are told they can sell their rum only to the United States: this concerns not their subsistence, but their profit. Examine it, however. In 1773, the new United States took near three millions gallons rum. The remaining British Colonies, Newfoundland, and the African Coast, have considerable demand for this article. The demand of Ireland is very much on the increase. It was, in 1773, 530,000 gallons; 1770, 1,558,000 gallons; 1778, 1,729,000 gallons.

Thus we see a total stoppage of the West India trade could not starve the islanders. It would affect us deeply; we should lose the sale of our products and of course not gain the carriage in our own vessels. The object of the contest would be no nearer our reach than before. Instead, however, of a total stoppage of the intercourse, it might happen that each nation prohibiting the vessels of the other, some third nation would carry on the traffic in its own bottoms. While this measure would disarm our system, it would make it recoil upon ourselves. It would in effect operate chiefly to obstruct the sale of our products. If they should remain unsold, it would be so much dead loss; or if the effect should be to raise the price on the consumers, it would either lessen the consumption or raise up rivals in the supply. The contest as it respects the West India trade is in every respect against us. To embarrass the supply from the United States, supposing the worst as it regards the planters, can do no more than enhance the price of sugar and coffee, and other products. The French islands are now in ruins, and the English planters have an increased price and double demand in consequence. While Great Britain confined the Colony trade to herself, she gave to the Colonists in return a monopoly in her consumption of West India articles. The extra expense arising from the severest operation of our system, is already provided against two-fold. Like other charges on the products of labor and capital, the burden will fall on the consumer. The luxurious and opulent consumer in Europe will not regard and perhaps will not know the increase of price nor the cause of it. The new settler who clears his land and sells the lumber, will feel any convulsion in the market more sensibly without being able to sustain it at all. It is a contest of wealth against want; of self-denial, between luxury and daily subsistence, that we provoke with so much confidence of success. A man of experience in the West India trade will see this contrast more strongly than it is possible to represent it.

One of the excellencies for which the measure is recommended is, that it will affect our imports. What is offered as an argument is really an objection. Who will supply our wants? Our own manufactures are growing, and it is a subject of great satisfaction that they are. But it would be wrong to overrate their capacity to clothe us. The same number of inhabitants require more and more, because wealth increases. Add to this the rapid growth of our numbers, and perhaps it will be correct to estimate the progress of manufactures as only keeping pace with that of our increasing consumption and population. It follows that we shall continue to demand in future to the amount of our present importation. It is not intended by the resolutions that we shall import from England. Holland and the North of Europe do not furnish a sufficient variety or sufficient quantity for our consumption. It is in vain to look to Spain, Portugal, and the Italian States. We are expected to depend principally upon France; it is impossible to examine the ground of this dependence without admitting that the present situation of that country, verting to the subject upon which I practise no disguise, but I do not think it proper to introduce the politics of France into this discussion. If others can find in the scenes that pass there, or in the principles and agents that direct them, proper subjects for amiable names and sources of joy and hope in the prospect, I have nothing to say to it. It is an amusement which it is not my intention either to disturb or to partake of. I turn from these horrors to examine the condition of France in respect to manufacturing capital and industry. In this point of view, whatever political improvements may be hoped for, it cannot escape observation, that it presents only a wide field of waste and desolation. Capital, which used to be food for manufacturing industry, now lights the fires of civil war, and quickens the progress of destruction. France is like a ship, with a fine cargo, burning to the water's edge, she may be built upon anew, and freighted with another cargo, and it will be time enough when that shall be, to depend on a part of it for our supply; at present, and for many years, she will be not so much a furnisher as a consumer. It is therefore obvious, that we shall import our supplies either directly or indirectly from Great Britain. Any obstruction to the importation will raise the price which we who consume must bear.

That part of the argument which rests on the supposed distress of the British manufacturers in consequence of the loss of our market, is in every view unfounded. They would not lose the market in fact, and if they did, should we prodigiously exaggerate the importance of our consumption to the British workmen? Important it doubtless is, but a little attention will expose the extreme folly of the opinion, that they would be brought to our feet by a trial of our self-denying spirit. England now supplies France in the important Levant trade, in the supply of manufactured goods to the East and in a great measure to the West Indies, to Spain, Portugal, and their dependencies. Her trade with Russia has of late vastly increased; and she is treating for a trade with China; so that the new demands of English manufactures, consequent upon the depression of France as a rival, has amounted to much more than the whole American importation, which is not three millions.

in 1773, amounted to	- 10,556,000

The ill effect of a system of restriction and prohibition in the West Indies has been noticed already. The privileges allowed to our exports to England may be withdrawn, and prohibitory or high duties imposed. Mr. A. observed that not one of our articles is a monopoly, and noticed the effect of counter regulations on our products. He adverted particularly to pot and pearl ashes, and observed on the value of the extensive sale of that article, as it advances the clearing and settlement of our new lands; he said, the best encouragement for agriculture is a good market.

The system before us is a mischief that goes to the root of our prosperity. The merchants will suffer by the schemes and projects of a new theory. Great numbers were ruined by the convulsions of 1775. They are an order of citizens deserving better of Government than to be involved in new confusions. It is wrong to make our trade wage war for our politics. It is now scarcely said that it is a thing to be sought for but a weapon to fight with. To gain our approbation to the system, we are told it is to be gradually established; in that case, it will be unavailing. It should be begun with in all its strength, if we think of starving the islands. Drive them suddenly and by surprise to extremity, if you would dictate terms, but they will prepare against a long-expected failure of our supplies.

Our nation will be tired of suffering loss and embarrassment for the French. The rice growers and tobacco planters of the South will be, and ought to be, soon weary of a contest which they are told is to benefit ship owners of the East. The struggle, so painful to ourselves, so ineffectual against England, will be renounced, and we shall sit down with shame and loss, with disappointed passions and aggravated complaints. War, which would then suit our feelings, would not suit our weakness. We might perhaps find some European Power willing to make war on England, and we might be permitted by a strict alliance to participate the misery and the dependence of being a subaltern in the quarrel. The happiness of this situation seems to be in view when the system before us is avowed to be the instrument of avenging our political resentments. Those who affect to dread foreign influence will do well to avoid a partnership in European jealousies and rivalships. Courting the friendship of the one, and provoking the hatred of the other, is dangerous to our real independence; for it would compel America to throw herself into the arms of the one for protection against the other. Then foreign influence, pernicious as it is, would be sought for, and though it should be shunned, it could not be resisted. The connexions of trade form ties between individuals and produce little control over Government. They are the ties of peace, and are neither corrupt nor corrupting.

In the course of his speech, Mr. A. adverted to the danger of cutting off a part of the public revenue by the operation of the proposed regulations. He remarked upon the hostile tendency of the resolutions; we have happily escaped from a state of the most imminent danger to our peace. A false step would lose all the security for its continuance which we owe at this moment to the conduct of the PRESIDENT. What is to save us from war: not our own power which inspires terror; not the gentle and forbearing spirit of the Powers of Europe at this crisis; not the weakness of England; nor her affection for this country; if we believe the assurance of gentlemen on the other side. What is it then? It is the interest of Great Britain to have America for a customer, rather than an enemy. And it is precisely that interest which gentlemen are so eager to take away, and to transfer to France. And what is stranger still, they say they rely on that operation as a means of producing peace with the Indians and Algerines. The wounds inflicted on Great Britain by our enmity, are expected to excite her to supplicate our friendship and to appease us by soothing the animosity of our enemies.

What is to produce effects so mystical, so opposite to the nature, so much exceeding the efficacy of their pretended causes? This wonder-working paper on the table, is the weapon of terror and destruction—like the writing on Belshazzar's wall, it is to strike parliaments and nations with dismay. It is to be stronger than fleets against pirates, or than armies against Indians. After the examination it has undergone, credulity itself will laugh at these pretensions.

We pretend to expect not by the force of our restrictions, but by the mere show of our spirit, to level all the fences that have guarded for ages the monopoly of the Colony trade.

The repeal of the Navigation Act of England, which is cherished as the palladium of her safety, which time has rendered venerable and prosperity endeared to her people, is to be extorted from her fears of a weaker nation. It is not to be yielded freely, but violently torn from her; and yet the idea of a struggle to prevent indignity and loss, is considered as a chimera too ridiculous for sober refutation. She will not dare, say they, to resent it, and gentlemen have pledged themselves for the certain success of the attempt; what is treated as a phantom is vouched by fact. Her Navigation Act is known to have caused an immediate contest with the Dutch, and four desperate sea-fights ensued, in consequence, the very year of its passage. How far it is an act of aggression for a neutral nation to assist the supplies of one neighbor, and to annoy and distress another, at the crisis of a contest between the two, which strains their strength to the utmost, is a question which we might not agree in deciding. But the tendency of such unreasonable partiality, to exasperate the spirit of hostility against the intruder, cannot be doubted. The language of the French Government would not soothe this spirit.

It proposes, on the sole condition of a political connexion, to extend to us a part of their West India commerce. The coincidence of our measures with their invitations, however singular, needs no comment. Of all men, those are least consistent, who believe in the efficacy of the regulations, and yet affect to ridicule their hostile tendency. In the commercial conflict say they, we shall surely prevail, and effectually humble Great Britain. In open war we are the weaker, and shall be brought into danger, if not to ruin. It depends, therefore, according to their own reasoning, on Great Britain herself, whether she will persist in a struggle which will disgrace and weaken her, or turn it into a war which will throw the shame and ruin upon her antagonist. The topics which furnish argument to show the danger to our peace from the resolutions, are too fruitful to be exhausted. But without pursuing them further, the experience of mankind has shown that commercial rivalships, which spring from mutual efforts for monopoly, have kindled more wars and wasted the earth more than the spirit of conquest.

He hoped we should show by our vote, that we deem it better policy to feed nations than to starve them, and that we should never be so unwise as to put our good customers into a situation to be forced to make every exertion to do without us. By cherishing the arts of peace, we shall acquire, and we are actually acquiring the strength and resources for a war. Instead of seeking treaties, we ought to shun them, for the later they shall be formed, the better will be the terms—we shall have more to give and more to withhold. We have not yet taken our proper rank, nor acquired that consideration, which will not be refused us if we persist in prudent and pacific counsels, if we give time for our strength to mature itself. Though America is rising with a giant's strength, its bones are yet but cartilages. By delaying the beginning of a conflict, we insure the victory.

By voting out the resolutions, we shall show to our own citizens, and foreign nations, that our prudence has prevailed over our prejudices, that we prefer our interests to our resentments. Let us assert a genuine independence of spirit; we shall be false to our duty and feelings as Americans, if we basely descend to a servile dependence on France or Great Britain.

When Mr. Ames had concluded, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28.

A memorial of the Delegates from the several States, for promoting the abolition of slavery, in Convention assembled, at Philadelphia, on the first instant, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress may adopt such measures as may be the most effectual and expedient for the abolition of the slave trade. Also a memorial of the Providence Society for abolishing the slave trade, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said memorials be referred to Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. WARD, Mr. GILES, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. GROVE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of Philip Peckham, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for his services in superintending the building and repairs of boats, employed by order of Major General Sullivan, for the use of the American Army, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

FRENCH REFUGEES.

A petition of Peter Gauvain and Louis Dubourg, in behalf of the French refugees of Cape François, now at Baltimore, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will speedily decide on the memorial of the committee appointed by the Legislature of Maryland, to draw for, and distribute, the moneys granted by that

State for the relief of the French emigrants from the Island of St. Domingo.

Mr. MURRAY moved that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, along with the report of the select committee upon it. He thought it would be an act of humanity to relieve the persons mentioned in the petition. And if that was improper, he thought that the next greatest act of humanity which could be done, was to relieve them from suspense.

Mr. CLARK was of opinion that the matter should be instantly taken up, as the fund for their relief expired on the 2d of February next.

Mr. HUSTON, from South Carolina, mentioned a remarkable exertion of benevolence respecting persons of this kind, which had taken place in that State. The motion was agreed to, and the House directly resolved itself into a Committee on the question.

It was then moved and seconded, that the President be authorized to pay $10,000 of the public money for the use of the refugees, and to negotiate the payment of it, with the Ministry of France.

Mr. BOURNOR was convinced, that, by the Constitution, the House had a right to give it in the first instance. He considered the Committee as too confined, and thought that it should have comprehended all the people of this sort in North America. Many of these people, since Winter set in, must have perished of cold and want in the streets of Philadelphia, but for the benevolence of some well-disposed people. He urged the Committee, in the most pathetic language, to extend immediate and effectual relief.

Mr. S. SMITH was confident that Congress would be repaid with thanks by the Republic of France. He said that a supply of powder and ball had been sent from one of the Southern States to St. Domingo, and that the price had been punctually and thankfully repaid. Santhonnax and Pulverel had been recalled, who were the authors of all the mischief that had happened. The refugees expected to return to their settlements before the 1st of May, and they would then be very able and very willing to repay the money themselves.

Mr. SMITH recommended the entering into a negotiation with the French Ambassador, for securing payment of what sum should be voted.

Mr. CLARK hoped that the motion would instantly pass. In a case of this kind, we were not to be tied up by the Constitution. Were Algerines cast upon the mercy of America, in such a situation, he would pay them the same tribute of humanity. The French Ambassador had restricted his services to a particular class of people. It was not the business of the House, whether the refugees at Baltimore were democrats or aristocrats. They were men; and, as such, were entitled to compassion and to relief.

Mr. S. SMITH, in reply to Mr. SMITH, said, that Mr. Genet, when solicited on behalf of these people, made answer, that he was not authorized on the part of the Republic to give them any thing, but sent them $2,000 from himself.

Mr. SMITH replied that Mr. SMITH had mistaken him; he did not wish to seek money from Mr. Genet. But he thought it would be singular to give away so large a sum, without endeavoring to secure the approbation of the French Minister, as a step towards repayment.

Mr. DEXTER had formerly entertained scruples, but he now approved the motion.

Mr. NICHOLAS did not approve the motion in its original shape, nor did he like it better by its being now altered into a motion for authorizing the President to pay the money. Mr. N. expressed, in the strongest and most unequivocal language, his compassion for the sufferers; but, as he had not seen a way pointed out of relieving them, agreeably to the Constitution, he recommended a shorter one. Out of the liberal compensation which the members of that House received from the country, he thought that the sum wanted might easily be subscribed. He did not know whether the Republic would thank us for helping them; perhaps they might be accounted rebels.

Mr. FRIZZMOORE proposed a second amendment of the original motion.

Mr. NICHOLAS replied: If this thing goes down at all, it should be as an act of charity, and marked in giving, that it is going beyond our power, but that, from a knowledge of the universal obligations to France, we have granted the money.

Mr. SCOTT pressed for the relief in reference to the citizens of Baltimore. If they were invaded by an army, we certainly would assist them; and where is the difference, (added Mr. S.) whether they be an army of fighters, or an army of eaters. We must relieve them, to be sure.

Mr. S. SMITH said that these distressed people were all women and children, except three old men. The boys who were old enough, had been bound apprentices. The men had been enlisted by the advice of Mr. Genet, who said the Republic wanted recruits. He had likewise obtained two ships for five hundred of the refugees who wanted to go to France. Genet was able to do nothing more for them, as the $2,000 that he gave, were out of his own pocket. It had been alleged, that there was no precedent for relieving these people. He mentioned two. The Americans in captivity at Algiers had been assisted by the British Consul. Some years ago, the crew of an American vessel had been shipwrecked on the coast of Portugal. They were assisted with the utmost generosity by a private gentleman. In both cases, Congress thankfully repaid the money advanced.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] had offered his salary, but the idea had not been supported, so that it went for nothing. And are we, (said Mr. S.) to stand up here, and tell the world that we dare not perform an act of benevolence? Is this to be the style of an American Congress? The gentleman from Virginia had said that perhaps these people would be considered as traitors by the Republic. Were women and fatherless children to be regarded as traitors? Mr. S. was extremely affected, and apologized more than once to the House for the warmth with which he spoke. He said that himself and others who had witnessed the scene of distress, were surprised; the gentleman did not feel as they did.

Mr. MADISON possessed Constitutional scruples. He thought that the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. S. SMITH) would not have injured his cause by a greater moderation of language, nor his credit for benevolence by not saying that his sympathy arose chiefly from being an eye witness.

At last, the SPEAKER proposed to the Committee an amendment, which met the ideas of the members, and the resolution passed as follows:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding — dollars be appropriated for the support of such of the inhabitants of St. Domingo, resident within the United States, as shall be found in want of such support.

That a regular account of the moneys so expended be kept; and that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to obtain a credit therefor, in the accounts between the French Republic and the United States.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill in conformity with the foregoing resolution, and providing for the due application of the moneys aforesaid; and that Mr. AMES, Mr. TRACY, and Mr. DENT, be the said committee.

COMMERCE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. RUTHERFORD said: Perhaps too much stress has been laid on the interest of the moment, and on the temper of nations. Be that as it may, the resolutions in question are truly patriotic, as they contemplate, with other objects, placing our manufactures in an easy train of progression, and retrenching a little some branches of our present commerce, and therefore this important business seems to resolve itself into two great questions, which I shall only keep in view on this occasion.

First. Is there an excess in any branch of our commerce? Secondly. Have these States arrived at the proper period for commencing manufactures? In observing, on this great subject, I shall not proceed to minute deductions or abstruse reasonings. Much debate has already prevailed, and no doubt, from motives the most pure and patriotic, and I trust the same purity of intention will actuate me at this time.

I have, through life, been governed by a few plain maxims, and perhaps some of these may apply in the present case.

The husbandman who attends with unremitting care to his fruit trees or vines, when he discovers a branch or shoot drawing too much nourishment, he crops the luxuriant growth. And if the farmer discovers a disposition in his neighbor to divert the attention of his family from the common interest, and to pocket the fruits of their toil, he narrows the ground of future intercourse as far as possible with such neighbor.

I pay the greatest respect to the opinions of gentlemen. In short, I reverse their sentiments while I differ with them.

The United States are happily independent, and, as other nations, are to act a part on the great theatre of this world. And I am aware of the malignity, envy, jealousy, and all the other fell passions, so predominant with nations in general. I am also well aware that the commerce of this people is a subject which embraces present and remote consequences of the greatest importance; and I hope that I shall not incur the imputation of vanity, in saying that I am second to very few, in a tender and paternal regard for the well-being of this our common country.

All temporal things are subject to excess, and the people, by their representatives, have a right to judge when the tide, even of commerce, is verging to a dangerous and destructive channel. And shall not this great and growing country exert a timely and cautious prudence against the selfish policy of any nation? Surely, the American people may pursue such measures as appear to be for the advantage of their free citizens without incurring the resentment of any. But if, in despite of the purest intentions, and of justice and moderation, a malignant and hostile temper in any, should be the result, it is the duty of a great and generous people to meet the event with firmness, an indignant contempt, and to prepare for the worst.

I confess that I consider the genius of commerce almost as a divinity, yet I cannot expand my faith with those who contend that it may rush against and overturn all the fences of reason, and in the end regulate itself. A position to me as incongruous, as that the atoms innumerable, which float in our atmosphere, shall at last adhere, and form an intelligent being.

If circumstances in the course of our commerce are, in some measure against us, and which few deny, the longer this subtle evil prevails, the more arduous the task in removing it; habits of long standing are very obstinate. We shall be told from time to time, that the period is not yet, when American manufactures may be introduced. It is natural for man to entertain a pleasing desire to remain on his native spot, and this will be the case while the many thousands we support beyond the Atlantic can be supplied by us with materials, and fed at home. It is, in my opinion, high time to form the basis of our real independence. Some of our present commercial connexions are so far on excess, as to endanger the propagation of a spirit and opinions repugnant to the freedom and real interest of the greatness of the people, by inducing them to believe that they ought implicitly to concur with those who advocate commerce, though in excess, be their motives what they may. It is visionary to hope that all the agricultural productions of this extensive Continent can always find a market at the islands in the Atlantic, and those sterile tracts of Europe which now receive them. It would afford me much real pleasure if such were the case—fond as I am of agriculture, and anxiously engaged for the prosperity of all who are prosecuting that very necessary and life-sustaining occupation.

Lack of bread, or other articles which compose our supplies, will at all times bring forward purchasers. No ship navigates the ocean to serve United America. It is interest that stimulates the mariner.

The Eastern States are competent to several branches of manufacture, and to the production of wool, flax, &c. Their habits of economy, patience, and industry, are entitled to great praise. I consider them as very respectable branches of the Union, while I admire that spirit of enterprise conspicuous in their brave citizens. But if their scene of action should be a little circumscribed, they can be usefully employed at their peaceful homes, in the enjoyment of every domestic comfort.

The Middle States are productive of iron and other things necessary, and are prosecuting some manufactures with effect. They have from the first been engaged in manufactures. Pennsylvania, I well remember, has long attended to manufactures, and to the comfort of her artificers, which has conducted to the present opulence and real independence of her citizens. My recollection takes in the first mainly growth of this State: look to it now. Behold what the majesty of the people is acting and doing for the common weal! Then why hesitate, and thus timidly look to others for what is here attainable?

The Southern States produce cotton and other necessary articles, and are susceptible of great improvement in manufactures, as great numbers of a certain description that are for the most part idle, may be usefully and advantageously employed.

One State on the Southwestern frontier can supply all nations with hemp, and it might perhaps be of public utility to encourage the growth of this valuable article, as well as some particular branch of manufacture.

Why should the American citizens, possessed of the most fertile and extensive Continent, wish to act like those confined within very narrow limits? Let us cast our eyes to one of those great commercial nations. View their preposterous naval armaments. Are not their subjects oppressed and bowed down with taxes? But can this oppressive burden secure them against an enormous and fast increasing public debt? No: nor against perpetual conflicts, and the most violent discord with other nations.

Shall the great body of American citizens place all their hopes on the turbulent seas?—bid adieu to every endearing connexion, explore every sea and dangerous coast on the globe—for what? I know to such intrepidity—such a spirit of enterprise. But what says reason? Stay at home, my sons, and comfort those with whom you are endearingly connected.

The great art of Government is, to support in comfort the greatest numbers; and therefore, the Government of China is considered by many as a very good one, their numbers being exceedingly great. These people are zealously attached to the soil of their widely extended country. The natives of China are not seen in every part of the habitable earth, nor on the remotest seas. Upon the whole, it is with me conclusive, that there may be dangerous excess even in some commercial transactions; and that to cherish manufactures, as far as reason and the state of things dictate, is politically and absolutely necessary.

Mr. FORREST rose merely to solicit that the question might be put, as enough had been said on both sides of it.

Mr. MURRAY said, he should feel himself admonished, by the lateness of this period of the debate, and call of the question from his colleague, to shorten the remarks which he intended to offer against the resolutions, nor would he now presume on the indulgence of the Committee, after so much had been said, did he not hold it to be the duty of a Representative to use every exertion, either to obtain a good, or to avert an evil. He would endeavor to avoid tiring the Committee with a repetition of what had been so ably stated by those with whom he thought, and would leave the clear and comprehensive statement of the relative situation of our trade towards Great Britain, France, and other Powers, to that good sense in the Committee, which would find ample consolation in the comparison. As his own prejudices, which he confessed were heretofore fostered by a defect of commercial knowledge, had yielded to the lights which his own examination, and that of others, had thrown on this question, he entertained a hope that others, similarly situated, would candidly and impartially view a subject, which demanded a dismission of prejudices and passion, and which ought to be tried upon a commercial principle, which was a competing and a comparing one.

He had early, and for a long time, taken up ideas without much examination, that the American commerce suffered from illiberal restrictions, and declared that, when the gentleman from Virginia first suggested his intentions, the outlines, which he so ably drew, met his strongest prepossessions. If anything from that gentleman, then, gave an inauspicious air to the measure he proposed, it was the eagerness with which he urged for an early and hasty discussion of these resolutions, which no member could look at, after all that had been said, without perceiving that they related to the best and largest interests of this country: interests which required diligence and much reflection to comprehend, and which all the passions and all the feelings could by no means do justice to in the estimate. They were interests that required great coolness to discern, and to measure properly. They had resulted from practice and the nature of our situation, and they ought to be treated with respect, and innovated on with caution. The restrictions contemplated a great change of commercial arrangements, bottomed both on presumed commercial injuries, sustained under its present regulations, and on political views, which long standing, and recent evils, had brought into notice.

He could not agree, that the commercial arrangements, at present existing, were the best that could possibly exist; nor was he insensible to the political evils we had endured, but he doubted how far these resolutions were formed to remedy the first, or to remove the last.

He believed the commercial situation of this country, relatively considered, towards the Powers of Europe, was now pretty well understood to be indebted more to interest than to partiality in any of the Powers.

That it was flourishing, when considered independently of the present war, from which nothing certain could be concluded, he had no doubt.

With respect to the comparative estimate of the restrictions and privileges imposed or granted by those Powers, or by the United States, he should trust the efficacy of the information on that part of the question, to the recollection of the Committee, and would confine himself to a few points which he believed had been but lightly touched on by others. He would endeavor to offer some remarks that he thought palliated some of the evils complained of as grounds of change; and confine his views to a few heads of complaint. It was said our commerce was shackled by the British, and by the influence of habit; that our tonnage was unequal to our exports; that arrangements might be made with other nations, who would give us a greater latitude and more liberal terms. He denied that the commerce of the United States was shackled or confined, or that it was restricted unnaturally by old Colonial habits. The report of the actual tonnage of the United States showed us a foreign commerce, employing 289,294 tons. Any man who was acquainted with the real state of this subject would naturally have concluded, from the declarations of gentlemen, that, so inventatively were our old Colonial habits formed, and so miserably was our commerce confined, this large amount of tonnage must have been concentrated in the ports of Britain or her Colonies.

The reverse was the truth, and, in support of this idea, he would refer to the report. This report shows that our ships visit every part of the world; that there is no place to which American enterprises does not convey our various products. It is a chart of our maritime genius, extremely exhilarating to our pride, and affords the strongest argument against the assertion. It goes beyond controversy; it is a contradiction which can be understood by any man who can read. There is no resisting its force, when adduced to prove, that so far is our commerce from being confined, that the most distant ports and oceans in Russia and China, and the Pacific, are its only boundaries. It completely illustrates the practical, as well as theoretical, independence of American commerce; for, of the whole amount of the tonnage employed abroad, but sixty-two thousand some odd hundreds, go to Britain and its dependencies; there are two hundred and twenty-seven thousand tons of this total employed among other nations; and Britain, which formerly monopolized, indeed, our commerce, has now a little more than one-fifth of the navigation of the United States in her ports. It is true that three-fourths of the imports are from thence, and that our export to her is not equal to this import; but that deficiency is paid circuitously and to advantage, by bills; for, as the trade is free to leave her, as the merchants, actuated by interest, would buy as cheap as possible, we are fairly to conclude, that they sell some of our raw materials and products to more advantage in other ports than hers, but yet purchase in her's cheaper; so, the commerce must be a beneficial one, or they would naturally forsake it. That our exports are greater to Portugal, Spain, and the United Provinces, than our imports from thence, is a proof that they give good prices for our products; but from want of assortment, or from their manufactures not being as saleable here, or as cheap as those from Britain, our merchants make up by bills from those places on London, to supply the deficiency of the export to that port. With respect to predilection for Britain, introduced as a ground of consumption, he did not believe it existed; certain he was, he felt it not himself. He could see nothing in the mere exercise of taste, in the consumption of manufactures, or preference of what was well manufactured and cheap, that was connected with the theory of political sentiment. In this country, no such predilection for that nation existed; on the contrary, he believed the most substantial interests of commerce were now at hazard, from the very prejudices which were used by gentlemen sometimes to prove the very reverse. As to the perfect freedom of trade, and that universal treaty, of which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] gave us a hint, but no outline, the other day, he questioned much if the accidental variance among nations, on which substantial differences had been moulded by habits, rendered the thing possible, and were it possible, whether all young countries that were not on even terms of manufacture, and ready for a competition of ingenuity, would not suffer extremely by the institution; he was sure this would. The idea was a benevolent one, but it was not one that could bear practice. On all questions in which great and complicated interests were under speculation, when habit and modes of life and taste, and an immemorial course of things were to be considered, he always wished to see much respect paid to the past as well as the existing order of such things, as long as the result of the whole seemed to be a great and certain share of national prosperity. It was, Mr. MURRAY observed, a difficult and hazardous thing to attempt to define with precision the particular cause of prosperity; it led to political quackery. We know, however, with certainty, that never did a country so rapidly move forward to perfection as do the United States—that our navigation has increased since the adoption of this Government, in proportion to other branches of trade, and that our commerce is both useful and ornamental, and the instrument of a revenue essential to the payment of a debt that we must discharge.

He said the complaint of gentlemen who supported the resolutions, that our tonnage was inadequate to our exports, was in his mind an inconsiderate and fallacious species of regret. It might be a desirable thing were our tonnage equal to our exports, but even this would be a good or an evil, as it might be connected, or not, with objects over which we had no certain control. He would remark, that such a state of navigation, at present, assumed two things as its basis—a great and manifest disproportion between all the branches of industry dependent on ship-building and navigation, and the other trade; and our power of becoming carriers for other nations, which would not be the case if maritime powers acted with their accustomed vigilance. Unless the last employment were provided for by the regulations of foreign Powers in favor of our ships, the first would be a serious evil. He thought it a safe proposition to which nothing but wild and crude speculation could be opposed, to say, that, as long as our right to be the carriers of other nations was not submitted to by them, the power to export all the raw materials of this country and its products would be an evil. This regret of gentlemen, he believed, to be founded on a comparison of this branch of trade here and in other maritime countries, as Holland, England, and some others. A little reflection would, he believed, afford consolation, by showing that their comparative superiority in the carrying business resulted from a solid difference in the situation of these countries, and of the United States; nay, that this very superiority is the result of necessity more than choice; a necessity which the free and happy citizens of this rich and abundant country did not feel, and which they would not feel for ages. The carrying trade of this country will never be equal to its exports, till the population of America bears a nearer proportion to the lands and the raw materials; till each branch of industry is proportionably supplied with labor; or the foreign Powers admit our carrying trade to a fair competition with their own. It is true, that we abound in articles of immense importance to the European artist, but they are so extremely bulky and heavy, that it is clear our exports require more than double the quantity of tonnage that the imports demand. The exports are, tobacco, rice, grain of all sorts, lumber, pot and pearl ash, and such heavy and bulky products; whereas, the imports are manufactures, small in bulk, high finished, light, portable, and of great value, for the space and tonnage they require in transportation. The proportion between them both is of value, and not of size. The first and great tendency of all things here, is towards agriculture and the rougher arts, as lumber-getting, which belongs to agriculture; the other arts and pursuits are but auxiliary to this main body of the national calling. This predilection and tendency will be for ever keeping up the ability to furnish the raw and bulky article of export, while it irresistibly diminishes the shipyard and its dependent arts of that industry which would be necessary to complete the power of affording domestic tonnage equal to the export; that is, we can afford more labor in the procuring of the export, than we can spare to the arts of ship-building and navigation. These pursuits that belong to agriculture and a settled life, are more congenial with our country, where freedom and plenty invite to marriage, the rearing of families, and the acquisition of lands. At present, he believed the seamen engaged in the foreign American tonnage, to say nothing of the coasting trade and fisheries, which doubled the amount, were more than in proportion to the citizens employed in the mechanic and manufacturing trade, making the relative proportions between them and England, the standard to judge by.

The tonnage rapidly increased every year; and he took it for granted, would observe a due proportion under its present great encouragement, which amounted just to an easy protection to stimulate industry, and secure cheap imports, without giving a rash monopoly to that branch of business—and here, he would remark, that under the existing regulation, the very best consequence flowed in on the consumer. By the additional duty of ten per cent. on goods imported in foreign bottoms, and the addition of forty-four cents per ton, we secured the importation of foreign goods to American tonnage, and by this means bought cheap; and, by leaving your ports free to foreign vessels, under an easy tonnage duty, there is a competition kept up in the domestic market for those exports, for which the foreign tonnage comes into your harbor. Thus, already, we buy cheap and sell dear at home. The competition that arises in our markets, in consequence of foreign ships becoming carriers of the surplus over that to which our own tonnage is equal, certainly raised the price of all things exportable; and a sudden and violent check in this order of things would vitally affect the agricultural, the lumber, the tobacco, and all the more bulky objects of exportation.

It appeared, then, to him, that the anticipation of effects from the resolutions, on the point of disproportion between our exports and tonnage, was calculated on a growth of navigation forced, unnatural, and pernicious; a growth that would call off from other employments the labor which is better bestowed as it now is, in increasing our ability to furnish, by enlarging the powers of agriculture.

A sudden alteration which would, for a considerable time check that competition between the foreign carrier and our own, for our products, would surely do mischief; nor could he see into what line of employment, except the mere carrying of our exports, would so immense an addition to our navigation be led; for, unless foreign Powers permit its participation in that branch of trade which, from local considerations, has ever been deemed so precious to them, the tonnage that covers the exports, over and above that quantity of it necessary to the imports, must return in ballast; that is, if the export requires six hundred thousand tons, and the imports but three hundred thousand, there will be the half of our tonnage employed abroad, either in voyages that will but little benefit our country, which wants internal labor more than foreign enterprise, at least of so useless a kind, or it will return in ballast.

But, even admitting its policy, he had no evidence of the only thing, which, combined with the idea of a navy, could render the object attainable, he meant the relaxation of the great navigation systems in Europe, which secured to their own ships, advantages, in which participation was contemplated. In the two great scenes, France and Great Britain, to which American habits and course of business would most probably lead, and from whence the manufactures were to be imported, the American carrier would find himself, after unlading his export, under restrictions which would force him to seek distant and circuitous trading voyages, or return home in ballast. In both these countries, he would find his enterprise checked by their respective Navigation Acts—for Monsieur Barrere has reported a Navigation Act; it has been adopted by the Convention; and, as far as it respects the carrying trade, precludes us, except merely for our own productions. The artificial progress of things in France in manufactures, her political rivalries, and her Colonial relations, one would have supposed, would long since have pointed out such an imitation of the English act. The English act seemed dictated by necessity arising from causes, which, somewhat resembling those of France, find little analogy in the present circumstances of this country.

When imitation is pointed out to us as a piece of policy, it is a duty to view our actual situation to discover similitude of principle and causes; and to estimate the importance of differences between national qualities here and in countries of whose practice and systems an imitation is proposed. If the situations, times, and causes are similar, there will be plausible ground. If other causes of national prosperity, more eligible than those of other countries, present themselves to our view, we ought to be cautious, certain, and slow to decide. Very remarkable differences are palpable here from the circumstances that seemed to him to have forced the carrying powers of Europe to be such. It was important to view them, for political contentment would result from a comparison in which we found our difference.

In no country, that Mr. MURRAY recollected, did the history of the carrying trade show us a people overflowing with raw materials and natural wealth, inhabiting a new, extensive, fertile soil, who became great carriers.

If we examine the causes that made Venice and Genoa, and other free States of Italy, the carriers for the West of Europe, through the Straits of Gibraltar, to all the States that were rich enough to purchase, or refined enough to enjoy the luxuries of Asia and the Mediterranean, we find them small, with no extent of fertility or soil; and with a population overflowing, and disproportioned to the land, labor, or its produce. The Hanse-Towns, the Dutch and the English, with a few shades of difference, were similarly situated when they became the successors to these Republics in the carrying trade.

Had all of them abounded in those bulky raw materials which arise from a soil like ours, with sparse population, with a greater disparity between labor and its objects, they never would have been the great carrying nations they were. We should have seen something like that equipoise of employment which the genius of our own country leads to; and agriculture at least disputing the pre-eminence with navigation, which in our country is but her handmaid.

We have, indeed, seen similar habits and systems. The insular position of Great Britain, her neighborhood and hostile rivalry with the Dutch, who preceded her in arts and in navigation, pointed out the Navigation Act to the Parliament, in 1651, as an instrument of resentment—and it seemed naturally to arise from her national qualities.

But it is observable and important, in considering the cause which rendered that act advisable, that, notwithstanding her insular situation and her fullness of inhabitants, there was wanting for half a century that co-operation of causes which occurred to give it all the efficacy it has been attended with since.

The proportion of British and foreign shipping was but little in favor of England till eleven years after the peace of Ryswick; at which period, in 1697, the British tonnage was 144,000, and the foreign tonnage 100,000. The causes that then began forcibly to operate in favor of the British, eleven years after, when the British tonnage was 240,000, and foreign but 45,000, were as irresistible as to that effect as they are remote, and fortanately so, from this country. A union with Scotland had taken place, and increased her exports; the manufactures of the country had received great comparative improvements; the American fisheries began to improve; Jamaica, which is immensely important to her, and a Kingdom in itself, became a considerable object; but, above all, these independent States, who were then very growing Colonies, became felt in the scale of national interest, and poured their bulky materials into her lap. Without a Colonial system, she would not have felt the benefit of her Navigation Act.

With a Colonial system, she, and other countries possessed of Colonies, have inducements and employment for a disproportion of navigation that this country is without, and needs not in her present progressive state of all things. And yet the gentleman's system looks to a Navigation Act, at a time when all is convulsion without, and where none, or very few of the causes that have led to such a scheme in other countries, are visible in our internal affairs. For, if we look into our local situation, we find a most extensive and fertile country, sparingly inhabited, and abounding in natural wealth. If we look at the English, we find contracted territory, redundancy of population, few or no raw materials, and scarcity of the necessities of life, with large capitals, and the greatest exertion of ingenuity in manufactures.

Importation of manufactures has been our practice, and seems, under the present degree, protection given to those which are adapted to our immediate attempts to be our interest. We import no raw materials scarcely, nor grain, nor necessities. They, on the contrary, import almost every thing, and manufacture every thing. In short, our situation is completely a contrast to theirs, and it is a contrast infinitely to our credit and comfort. It had led his mind to a full conviction that all our powers would gradually ameliorate together; and if left, as they have hitherto been, more to the exertions of an enterprising spirit and freedom, than rigidly directed by speculation and theory, they would, in the fulness and seasonableness of time, accomplish the extent and grandeur of design which nature seems to have destined as the social and political character of this country.

He was willing, therefore, to trust as much as possible to the operation of those causes which, whatever they were, had hitherto, under a fortunate neglect, produced effects and a prosperous train of things, which perhaps human contrivance and speculative wisdom had never attained for us. Had they meddled more than they have, they might, from the pernicious force of imitation applied to a scene which had not its like upon the globe, have thwarted that course of things which nature pointed out, and which has been successfully pursued. He could not, therefore, feel the force of a system that certainly meant to tamper with a condition in which, a very few things excepted, he felt satisfied and grateful. He had dwelt the longest on the fitness of a Navigation Act to the present circumstances of this country, as most of the arguments of those from whom he differed in opinion were drawn from the propriety of adopting something extremely like one.

But even taking it for granted, which cannot be admitted, that these resolutions afford, on general principles, a well-founded hope of relief from commercial and navigation restraints, he had no hesitation in saying that the present is the very worst time to try the solidity of the policy. It was bad, as it related to the chance of a war; and there was reason to fear that no nation would at this moment hold out great commercial temptations, except as a condition of joining in the war. It was bad, as it related to a commercial contest with other commercial nations; for where was the nation on whom we could rely under such a derangement of our trade as this system designs?

An alteration so great, in navigation, habits, employment of capital, and all sorts of commercial views, had been more reasonable and more practicable, if a clear necessity for such sacrifices could be shown; or if, in yielding to the force of a justly excited resentment against the British for insults offered to our flag, the gentleman had given us reason to believe that the sources of negotiation had been first exhausted; but there still remains a hope that negotiation and reflection might remedy evils which neither had been able to prevent.

At all events, the meditated change involved interests to our industry not to be hazarded on mere commercial theory, unsupported by the very last necessity. It was to be expected that any man who should make an attempt so serious as the present, would have come forward, with a statement of advantages to be derived from the change, so great and so certain as to warrant some hazard in the experiment. That, where he meant to change the stream of commerce and industry from its present bed, and exclude supplies of manufactures from one country, he would have pointed out another channel for its current, and have told us precisely the very nation from whose ports the new supplies of manufactures were to be substituted, and on what terms.

The gentleman who meditated this thorough change, ought to have had at least the outline of fresh treaties in his hand, for the old were worth nothing; he might thus have shown us the only ground of expectation that a nation ought to calculate on—a view of the interests of such nation with which an accommodation of our own might be moulded into treaty. But no such thing was practicable at the present time, and his measures ought to have waited for a proper time, had they been in other respects adapted to our policy and interests.

But even allowing times, and the settled state of things abroad, to have been at this moment such as to permit this measurement of the sober interests of all, it would not be useless to inquire shortly into the probable ground of treating, supposing a treaty for instance with France to be undertaken in the spirit of those resolutions. He would not indulge any of those romantic expectations which some seem to place in the affection of that, or any other nation on earth. He would look steadily at her interests, in order to form an opinion of what she would do, and he would measure her interests by her own scale—the opinions she had ever entertained since she became a great maritime Power. Ever since the days of Colbert, France has looked on her West Indies as the support of her maritime greatness. A jealousy, equal to that of any other country, had always appeared in her Colonial system; and a spirit of monopoly, which her interests as a maritime Power, to use the term, seemed to inspire.

The Republic, by their Navigation Act, seem determined to adhere to the Colonial system; or, if they at all relax, it is but a temporary yielding to transient necessity, rather than a principle of change, introduced by either a revolution of Government, or real and lasting alterations of their interests. Their interests would be the same now as heretofore, and that they meant to have a powerful marine was evident from their Navigation Act.

He did not believe they would let us into their West India trade freely, except under circumstances like the present, which operated on all alike. They never did permit a free export from their Islands but to the Mother Country, and thence circuitously to others; by these means, they were secure both of the carriage and a cheap supply. Were a treaty now offered, giving a free trade to those Islands, we would think it hazardous to discriminate in their favor on that account. We should be suspicious of an offer that stood on a sacrifice of their own interests, and would not calculate on the permanency of provisions, which the necessities of war and disorder produced, but which never would long survive those necessities, which peace would remove. But there was no such offer; nor was now the time to digest such a business as a treaty, if this were an offer really made.

He would not, then, fancifully indulge himself or his constituents in hopes which a view of the interests of France showed him to be fallacious, and he would not in so serious a question suppose that they, more than we, would act steadily on any other principle than interest; it was the only immortal principle in the intercourse of nations; it may vary its shape and modification, but never its nature; and it is the most useful, as it contains a perpetual stimulus to honest emulation.

Had a detail been entered into by gentlemen on the other side, of those provisions which we should rightfully expect of any Power, in whose favor discrimination was intended, our judgments would have had some employment on fixed and certain objects; we might, from a correct view of the benefits and temptation presented, have estimated with some precision, though not with perfect accuracy, the value of that gain which such a commutation promised, but at present we were in the dark, and foresaw nothing with certainty; commerce was to be let loose to be blown to any quarter of the world, but its certain direction was not to be counted upon, and could not be foreseen.

It was impossible, he observed, to calculate the extent of the good and the evil; but we were certain that there was not a nation in the world ready and prepared at present either to receive our advances, or to supply us with manufactures, if those resolutions succeeded. The only country to which we could look as a substitute to the British market, is at present in a state so convulsed, and in such a paroxysm of affairs, that from thence we had nothing to expect, nor did he think that a treaty, of which he had heard some intimation, with that country of justice and reciprocity would suit the United States. Mr. MURRAY much questioned whether any treaty with the Powers of Europe on perfect reciprocity, for instance with mutual duties of say five per cent. on imports, would suit our situation. Such a one would suit those nations only in which manufactures had obtained considerable perfection, but would be the ruin of our infant manufactures, which we must and ought occasionally to protect, by duties varied according to their progression, and the probability of the supply from them proving adequate to our demands.

The effects of these resolutions on our internal affairs immediately, would prove that they were pernicious and a real tax without a well-founded reason. They would immediately be perceived in a diminution of our revenue, in their operation on the value and price of goods, and in the reduction of the value of our produce and raw materials. The last would be affected from the discouragement of foreign shipping. The first, from the inability to bring in foreign manufactures, from which a duty could be raised, because the line of trade and correspondence being altered, it was impossible to say when or where the importing merchant would be able to form new connexions abroad, which were not things of a day or a year, but required much time and mutual confidence to mature.

The value of goods would immediately rise, and the merchant, every where actuated by the same principle, interest, which ought to guide us here, would benefit by the monopoly of goods to the injury of the farmer.

The moment these resolutions pass, said Mr. MURRAY, there is not a shop or a store in Philadelphia in which every imported article will not rise in price fifteen per cent., while our own produce will probably fall. But a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLS] wishes to see retrenchment; he confessed he saw no reason for violent self-denial. There was no society, he believed, in the world that could so well afford to live well, and taste of every rational and refined enjoyment, as the citizens of this free and happy country. The universal prosperity which this very commerce, which is designed to be destroyed, diffuses throughout America, justifies enjoyment. Very natural would it be for the farmer to inquire the causes of this sudden rise in the price against him. He would be told that the British had insulted our flag, and therefore our system of self-denial. Could it be answered that we had exhausted all the gentle means of negotiation? or could any man lay his finger on any country, in a map, and say we have a certainty that from this country we shall not only have supplies of goods, but sure and high prices for our country produce? This could not be said. Were there such a country now prepared and ready to substitute for our present connexions, he said he would feel more justified in voting for this change, for he, like every other American, had severely felt the indignities offered to our flag and posts by the British.

But, said Mr. MURRAY, it has been more than intimated, even in this House, that our country had pursued a pusillanimous conduct and stood in a humiliating point of view. He denied it. No country on earth stood, he believed, in a more exalted station among the nations, nor better supported the character of a spirited people. Could any nation be charged with pusillanimity that had declared such a neutrality as this country did last Spring? At a time when all the great and formidable Powers in Europe, combining every engine of immense force and despotism against the French, were hovering round her borders, and seemed determined to crush her; at a time when she had not one ally on earth, and no nation received her Ministers, the United States dared to maintain a treaty, that looked the proudest nations in the face? They dared to be just, and such times, and on so hazardous stipulations, that not only rescued them from every charge of humiliation, but, in his opinion, added to the glory of the country. No, this country was not humbled. Like a young man of virtuous mind, and of fortitude, just setting out into life and business, she comports herself among the nations with dignified reserve, with amiable and innocent manners; she complies with her engagements though imminent danger overhang the performance, and bravely trusts the consequences to Providence.

Mr. M. concluded with observing, that the state of the debate presented no temptation to discuss-sion, as all the points of relative privileges and restrictions, and the items of trade, had been ably and often stated. He had concluded, that as our trade does not at present (putting the disturbances of war out of the question) suffer from many restrictions which, when unacquainted with the subject, he thought did exist; as some of the existing restrictions against us belonged to systems over which we had no certain control, and which it did not suit us to imitate strictly; as the resolutions contemplated a change without affording a substitute in any degree, much less to more advantage; and as negotiation was not yet at an end, from which he hoped for some redress; as peace was his very first object, and, he believed, that of his constituents, and as those resolutions might go to disturb it, and did not appear to him supported by a certainty of advantage, though followed by great present and certain mischiefs, he should vote against them.

Mr. M. having concluded his speech, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States:

Mr. MADISON said, that most of the objections against the proposed resolutions had been made by those who meant to combat them, and that a question would soon be called for; it might, perhaps, be expected that he should review those objections, and assign the reasons which induced him to continue in the opinion he at first entertained. He wished it not to be understood that he meant to examine every particular argument which, in the course of so extensive a discussion, had been opposed to the measure. The Committee must have perceived that some of them had been of a nature not to merit an answer, and that others had sufficiently answered themselves. He should extend his observations to such topics only as might be thought to need explanation, and to have an influence on the question.

Previous, however, to this general survey of the ground which had been traveled over, he should so far presume on the patience of the Committee as to recur to the original opposition made by the member from South Carolina, [Mr. SUMTER,] and to take notice of some particulars, in what had been urged by him, which were left unanswered at the time.

The gentleman had thought proper to introduce his discourse with a very unmerited attack on the late Secretary of State, and to mingle with it a variety of criticisms on the facts and opinions stated in his report on the subject under consideration. The spirit and manner in which the attack had been made, and which could not have escaped the attention of the Committee, would be left in that silence which may best express the sentiment they must have inspired. He should, indeed, have thought it less necessary to take further notice than he had already done of the matter of the gentleman's remarks, if attempts had not been made, particularly by a friend of the gentleman, [Mr. Aves,] to give a weight to his statements and inferences which it would be shown they did not merit; and if the task did not afford an opportunity of elucidating some particular points relied on by the opponents of the resolution.

It was made a charge against the Secretary of State, that he takes no notice of the higher duty imposed by Great Britain on other foreign tobacco than is imposed on American, (the former being 3s. 6d. sterling a pound, the latter 1s. 3d.) whilst he takes care to mention the high duty imposed on the American; although the discrimination is in favor of the United States, and is against Portugal, a country in particular connexion with Great Britain; and although the high duty of 1s. 3d. is immaterial to the United States, being paid by the consumer of the tobacco in Great Britain.

It was unfortunate for the gentleman, that this charge is fallacious, in every member of it:

1. The discrimination is not in favor of the United States, either in its intention or in its operation; not in its intention, because it was made in reference to this country when it was a part of the British Empire, and not in reference to us as independent States; not in its operation, because, if the discrimination were abolished, it would bring no rival of our tobacco into the British market. This is proved by the fact that in other markets, as that of France, where no such discrimination exists, the American tobacco is without a rival. It was well known that this and the other apparent favors to this country were a remnant of the old Colonial Code, which, having become a dead letter on the Statute Book, had not yet been struck out of it.

2. If the discrimination had no effect in favor of the United States, it could not, for the same reason, be a prejudice to Portugal. If it were necessary and proper to go into the inquiry, more direct proofs could be given on this point.

3. High duties do affect the United States, which produce the article, though paid by the British consumers. They have a double effect; they lessen the quantity, called for; and by lessening the competition, they lessen also the price. This was a truth that could need no comment.

It was to be remarked, however, that the zeal of the gentleman on this subject was such, that it had led him to extend the fallacy of his reasoning to rice, the staple article of his own State. This article pays a duty of 7s. 4d. sterling per hundred weight; but, like the duty on tobacco, being paid by the consumer, was said to be of little concern to us.

Call the price of rice 10s. sterling, the duty is 7s. 4d. The whole class of people, then, in Great Britain, between the class who cannot afford to eat rice at the price of 10s., and the class who are willing to eat it at 17s. 4d., are prohibited the consumption by the duty. Was this a circumstance of no concern to the rice planters? The gentleman should have been reminded of his error by his own arguments.

As an apology for the duty imposed in Great Britain, he tells us it was meant to prevent the use of rice as a substitute for the bread-stuffs produced by Great Britain herself. Without the preventing duty, then, rice would have been substituted in place of wheat, in the opinion of the British Parliament, and the demand for it in the British market so far increased.

As a merit in the British West India regulations over those of France, it was stated by the gentleman that rice in the West Indies is a common food; that, in the British, the importation of it is free; in the French, subject to a duty, though an inconsiderable one. In Britain, then, where there is a high duty, rice is not an article of common food; in the Islands, where there is no duty, it is a common food; and the advantage of the British West India market to us over the French is, that the duty in the latter favors cheaper substitutes.

Another proof of the disposition of Great Britain to favor the United States in the West India market, is the prohibition of all foreign rice but the American. The same remark may be repeated here, which was applied to the discrimination in favor of our tobacco. It is an old Colony regulation that has no effect whatever. What other foreign rice could be brought to the West Indies? Is it the East India rice? That is prohibited by its distance. Is it the rice of Portugal? That is prohibited by the laws of Portugal, and probably also by the lower price of the Carolina rice.

The inference which the gentleman had drawn from the comparative regulations of Great Britain and France, on the subject of rice, was so curious that it was worth a moment's attention.

The facts, Mr. MADISON observed, stood thus: In France, the duty is 4 per cent. In Great Britain, 7s. 4d. sterling a hundred. In the French islands, the duty is 1 per cent. In the British, free, with a prohibition of other foreign rice.

As the duty of 1 per cent. is scarcely sensible, and the prohibition, as shown, is merely nominal, the inequality in the islands may be regarded as too immaterial to affect the comparison.

Passing to the two parent States, the duty in France is 4 per cent.; the duty in Great Britain, 60 or 60 per cent.

Here, then, is nearly an equality in one part, and a difference of 50 or 60 per cent. in the other part, of the two Dominions; and yet the gentleman could say it was not easy to pronounce whether the article of rice stands on a better footing in the system of the one than in the system of the other.

Another charge against the Secretary of State is, that his Report calls the discriminating duties in Great Britain in favor of American wood small, whereas they are considerable, and in several instances high.

Mr. MADISON said, he had not found leisure to trace this branch of our exports into all the details necessary to decide in what degree the duties were small or considerable, and in what proportion the several dutiable articles went to Great Britain. He observed, in general, that the greater part of our woods were exported to the West Indies, not to Great Britain; that in the ship-woods, at least, the Baltic nations were not rivals to the United States. It was known that Sweden and Denmark were so deficient in oak that their public navies were supplied from Germany, and that the ship timbers of Russia were transported a thousand or twelve hundred miles from her interior Dominions. The fir, of which the Swedish and Danish merchant ships were built, does not last more than seven or eight years, and could not, therefore, be a rival to the durable woods of the United States.

He observed, also, that lumber, and particularly the ship-woods of the country, were so precious, and so sure of being in demand, that they never could fear a rival or need a foreign bounty. This was an article very different from such as were an annual product of the earth, and as could be raised wherever the climate and soil permitted, according to the occasional demand. The forests that were to supply the ship yards were the growth of centuries; and where once destroyed, as they generally are in Europe, are rarely replaced at all, and never can become the rival to America, which enjoys them as the spontaneous gift of nature.

To enhance the merit of the British regulations, the gentleman had told us that wood was subject to a duty of 1 per cent. in the French Islands, and in the British free, with a prohibition of other foreign wood. This was of little consequence. The duty was a trifle, and, falling on a necessary article, to be got no where else, probably was paid by the French Islanders. And the prohibition was ideal, the American wood being the only resource for the British market.

The article of fish was admitted by the gentleman himself to be more favored by the French than the British system, though he admits it with reluctance, and diminishes the difference as much as possible. The case, however, is so clear, and the facts so palpable, that they speak for themselves. Under the French regulations, this important article of our commerce is subject to duties only in Europe and the West Indies. Under the British, it is under prohibition in both. The amount of the whole export is 382,237 quintals of dry, and 57,424 barrels of pickled fish. Of this, the French consumption is 232,171 quintals, and 45,164 barrels; that is, nearly two-thirds of the dry and four-fifths of the pickled fish.

Here Mr. MADISON, proceeding to the subject of whale oil, called the attention of the Committee particularly to the representation and language of Mr. SMITH as to the conduct of France, in inviting the fishermen of Nantucket to remove and settle at Dunkirk. Mr. SMITH, he said, had not only undervalued the monopoly of the French market to the United States, but had, by a mutilated quotation of a Report of the Secretary of State on the fisheries, changed the true aspect of the attempt to draw away the Nantucket fishermen. The fact was, that although the conduct of France was very different from what was to have been wished, as well as from what was contemplated by the Marquis LAFAYETTE, who had patronized the interest of the fishermen, yet that the project of tempting them to emigrate had originated in Great Britain, and was a counter project on the part of France. How the gentleman happened to omit the antecedent attempt of Great Britain, and thereby exaggerate that of France, Mr. MADISON did not undertake to explain; but it was the more extraordinary, as the whole account of the transaction was contained in the same page of the Report, nay, in the same paragraph, from which the gentleman had extracted his information.

Here he read the passage in that Report, and produced the British statute, inviting the whale fishermen, by an offer of certain privileges, to emigrate to Great Britain.

A further charge against the Secretary of State is, that in his statement of the tonnage of the United States employed in the trade with the French and British Dominions, he founds it, not on the actual number of ships, but on the actual number of entries. This charge was as singular as it was uncandid.

The Report stated the fact that the American tonnage entering our ports from the several nations with which the United States traded, was so and so; and in this statement it pursued the official returns made on the subject. What more was to be required?

In giving the fact, the Secretary imposed on no one, because he stated the tonnage to be entry tonnage, as it really was.

He followed the best guide that existed—an official return from the proper offices.

No return of the actual tonnage, as distinguished from the entry tonnage, had at the time ever been made from any office or called for by any act of Congress.

The first return ever made in the latter form, was called for since the resolutions on the table were proposed.

These considerations might have restrained the gentleman from this unwarranted attack on the accuracy of the Report.

But he ought at least to have been sure that, whilst he was charging the Secretary with following an erroneous guide, he was himself following one that was not erroneous. The examination of this point involved facts which merited the particular attention of the Committee.

The statement of the entry tonnage of the United States in foreign trade for 1792, lately called for and reported, is 415,331 tons. The statement of the actual tonnage for the same year, is 239,394 tons.

On comparing these two quantities, it was evident that both could not be right. If the entry tonnage was no more than was stated, it was inconceivable that the actual tonnage could be as much as was stated. It would allow the vessels in the European and West India trades, together, but somewhat more than one voyage and a third a year. It could never be supposed that this consistency in the fact. How, then, was the inconsistency in the two statements to be explained? Mr. Madison said, as he did not know by what rule the actual tonnage was made up, he would form no conjecture on the subject. He hoped and wished that some gentleman more conversant with it would solve the phenomenon. He did not call on the gentleman from South Carolina, because he, most of all, must be puzzled to account for it; having stated that our vessels in the trade to Europe make two voyages, and in the West India trade four voyages, a year.

Besides the evidence contained in this comparison of the aggregate tonnage in the two different forms in which it had been reported, the existence of error somewhere, and probably in the account of the actual tonnage, resulted from a comparative view of our exports to the British Dominions, for the two years of 1790 and 1792, and of the whole tonnage, American and British, employed in conveying them.

In the former year the exports were $9,363,416. In the latter, $8,269,495; the excess for 1790, $1,093,921.

The entry tonnage, British and American, for 1790, was 273,580 tons.

The British entry tonnage, for 1792, was 206,334 tons. The actual American tonnage for 1792, was, according to the official statement, 66,552 tons; which, turned into entry tonnage, according to the proportion of the whole actual to the whole entry tonnage for that year, makes the American entry tonnage, in the trade to Great Britain, about 95,000 tons. Adding this to the British entry tonnage of 206,334 tons, the British and American, together, for 1792, amounts to 301,334 tons; which exceeds the tonnage of 1790 no less than 27,804 tons.

According to this calculation which embraces the actual tonnage as stated to the House, there would be 27,804 tons more employed in transporting $1,093,921 less; making our tonnage to increase in that proportion as the employment of it decreased.

There was a possibility, Mr. Madison observed, that the course of trade in the two years might be such, that more of the vessels employed in the exportations to Great Britain might be entered in 1790 as coming from some other country than in 1792; but as there was no known circumstance which authorized this solution, and as it seemed demonstrable, in general, that error existed somewhere in the statements, and most probably in those of the actual tonnage, he concluded that it ought to be referred to that source; and, consequently, that the guide followed by the Secretary of State (to wit: the entry tonnage, the only one he had to follow) was not more inaccurate than the actual tonnage would have been, which guided the member from South Carolina.

Another position of the Secretary of State on which a charge is founded is, "that the greater part of what Great Britain receives from the United States is re-exported." This position, Mr.

Madison reminded the Committee, related to Great Britain, without comprehending the West India Islands, which formed a distinct branch in the Secretary's Report. How far it was liable to the exceptions taken against it, would appear from an examination of facts.

To obviate criticisms, Mr. Madison said he would take for the basis of his calculations the statement, given in detail by the gentleman himself, of the exports for 1790 to the French and British Dominions; which, though not extended to every item, approached so near to a full view of the trade as to be adequate to the purpose.

In the statement, the exports to Great Britain stand at $6,651,429; from which must be subtracted, for the comparison, the amount of the several re-exportations, as far as they can be liquidated.

Tobacco.—It appears from an official document, that the tobacco exported to Great Britain in 1791 was 67,286 hogsheds. A return for another year states the quantity to be 52,505 hogsheds. It appeared from the revenue returns of Great Britain, that the consumption of this article amounted to 9,600 hogsheds. The proportion re-exported might then be reasonably set down at four-fifths of the quantity imported.

Rice.—To obtain the proportion of rice re-exported, we may take the medium quantity imported for three years immediately preceding the Revolution, which, according to a table in Anderson's History of Commerce, was 486,543 cwt. By another table for the same period, the medium quantity exported was 349,653 cwt. The difference marks the consumption, and is 136,890 cwt. The quantity exported to Great Britain from the United States in 1792 was 58,978 barrels—equal to 294,890 cwt. Comparing the quantity consumed with this quantity, it appears that more than half, though less than two-thirds, is re-exported—call the re-exportation one-half only of the present importation.

Indigo.—According to a statement in Anderson, the medium importations into Great Britain, for three years immediately preceding the Revolution, were about thrice the medium quantity exported. Call the proportion re-exported now, however, one-fifth only, which is probably below the fact.

From these proportions, and the data furnished by the gentleman's own statement, result the following justification of the Report of the Secretary on the point:

Exports to Great Britain	-	$6,651,429
Tobacco	-	$2,754,493
Consumed, one-fifth	-	550,898
Re-exported	-	$2,203,595
Rice	-	773,852
Consumed, one-half	-	386,926
Re-exported	-	386,926
Indigo	-	473,830
Consumed, four-fifths	-	379,064
Re-exported	-	94,766

Wheat and flour,

perhaps the whole re-exported; and more was carried to Great Britain in the two succeeding years, though the aggregate exports thither were less than in the year here taken: say, however, that one-fourth was consumed, and let the amount stand according to the gentleman's statement, at 1,087,840

Consumed, one-fourth

Here, then, it appears that their exportations of the four articles alone, of tobacco, rice, indigo, and wheat, are greater than the whole consumption in Great Britain of the articles imported from the United States, although the most unfavorable year has been taken for the inquiry; and, consequently, that the position of the Secretary of State was well founded.

If it were necessary to investigate the full amount of re-exportations, several articles might have been added to the list, such as whale oil, ginseng, flaxseed, &c.

Nor would it be unfair, perhaps, to include the primitive value of the articles re-exported in the new forms given to them by art. A great proportion of what is sent from the United States to Great Britain, in a rude state, is worked into articles of merchandise, and exported in the course of trade. Take, for example, the two articles of pot and pearl ashes and indigo.

The amount of the export of the former to Great Britain is stated at $747,078; of which, if no part is re-exported in its unaltered state, the whole enters into British manufactures. Supposing one-third of these particular manufactures to be exported, which appears to be nearly the general proportion, the value of pot and pearl ashes re-exported is $249,026. The indigo used in Great Britain has appeared to be $379,064, one-third of which re-exported as an ingredient in manufactures, is $126,354. These two items alone amount to $375,280; and, with many others, might be added to the mass of re-exportations. But they are stated rather to throw light on the general character of our trade with Great Britain than to be relied on in the present case, which has been sufficiently elucidated by more direct and simple views of it.

Mr. Madison proceeded to apply the calculations he had made to the question discussed by Mr. Sumner, in relation to the comparative importance of the French and British markets to the productions of the United States.

By deducting the $3,501,067 re-exported, from the $6,651,429 imported into Great Britain, he reduced her actual consumption to $3,150,362; to which, adding the $1,805,744 exported to the West India market, the whole British consumption stands at no more than $4,956,106. On comparing this with the exports to the French Dominions, (which re-export none of any consequence,) to wit: $4,424,336, the subject took a very different aspect from that which had been given to it.

But there was, Mr. Madison observed, a circumstance of the utmost importance to a fair view of this question, which had been wholly overlooked by the gentleman from South Carolina, and which cut up his calculations by the roots. The re-exportations from Great Britain were not only to be subtracted from the consumption of Great Britain, but, in a great degree being made to France, were to be added to the value of her market to the agriculture and commerce of the United States.

The re-exportation from Great Britain to France could not be accurately fixed by any documents to be had here. In general, they were known to be great. He would, he said, confine himself to the two articles of tobacco and flour, of which he estimated the amount as follows:

The tobacco exported from the United States appears to be about 100,000 hogsheds. It is valued in the return of our exports at $4,349,567. It is known that France consumes about one-fourth of the whole quantity exported; that is, $1,087,392. It appears, by the return of our exports, that the direct exports of this article to France stand at $384,642. The indirect supplies, then, to France, not appearing in the returns of our exports, and to be added to them, are $702,750.

Of the flour and grain sent to Great Britain, allowing, as above stated, one-fourth to have been there consumed, which is probably beyond the truth, the re-exportation amounted to $815,880. It is well understood that France was the market where these articles were finally consumed. The account may now be stated:

To the French market, directly exported for consumption	-	$4,424,336
Tobacco indirectly exported for consumption	-	702,705
Wheat and flour indirectly exported for consumption	-	815,880
Total of French consumption	-	5,942,921
Total of British consumption	-	4,956,106
Excess of French consumption	-	986,815

Thus it appears, without taking into the account the other articles re-exported to France, that the market of that country for our exports was worth to the United States nearly a million more than the market of Great Britain; and yet the gentleman from South Carolina had represented the British markets as exceeding the French in the annual amount of between three and four millions; and had pronounced, without hesitation, that Great Britain, in reference to our productions, was a more important customer than France, almost in the ratio of two to one.

Mr. Madison, returning to the Secretary's Report, said he hoped, after what had been shown, it would be needless to trouble the Committee with further remarks on the subject. In dismissing it, however, he could not do justice to his own impressions, without declaring his entire confidence that the Report would be regarded by all discerning and unprejudiced judges as one of the many monuments which its author had left behind him, of the zeal, the talents, and the patriotism with which he had discharged the duties of his station; and that he had carried with him into retirement a purity, both in his public and private name, which nothing that could be said within or without the walls of Congress could tarnish.

Having gone through the particular observations into which he had been led by the attack made on the Report of the Secretary of State before the Committee, he should proceed to a more general view of what had been urged by the opponents of the resolutions he had introduced.

Among other things, it had been alleged, in the latter stages of the debate, that the friends of the resolutions had involved themselves in inconsistency, by shifting the ground of argument from commercial to political considerations. In answer to this charge, he remarked, that if in any instance of his public life he was free from the charge of inconsistency, it was on the subject of vindicating our national interest against the policy of Great Britain towards us; that in all the public stations with which he had been honored since the peace, and on every occasion which had occurred, his conduct had been marked by an adherence to this principle; that the resolutions he had last proposed were founded on this principle; that if, in the first arguments supporting them, he had dwelt chiefly on commercial topics, it would be recollected that he kept the door open for political ones, if the turn of the discussion should require them. That he had foreborne to enlarge on the political sides of the question, because he thought it defensible on commercial grounds, and was willing to meet it on those grounds, because he did not wish to mingle, unnecessarily, irritating ideas in the discussion, and because he had supposed that every thing relating to the Treaty of Peace, the Indians, Algerines, the spoliations, &c., were sufficiently imprinted on every mind, and would have all the effects they ought to have, without being particularly enforced.

Whilst he could thus repel the charge of inconsistency brought against himself, it must be evident, he thought, how much room there was for retorting the charge. In the early stages of the discussion, there seemed but one sentiment as to the conduct of Great Britain, at least in a political view. The difference turned on the question, whether we could or ought to counteract her conduct. In the latter stages of the discussion, palliations if not justifications had been multiplied and labored, not only with respect to her commercial policy, but with respect to the detention of the posts, the Indians, the Algerines, and even the spoliations of our neutral commerce; on the unlawfulness of which, our Executive had grounded the remonstrance and demand of indemnification lying on the table.

In addition to this, he stated the inconsistency between those who maintained and those who rejected the theory of leaving commerce perfectly free; the inconsistency of rejecting this theory, and yet refusing to meet restrictions on one side with restrictions on the other; the inconsistency of condemning a commercial discrimination between nations, as contrary to the wise example of Great Britain, and claiming for Great Britain the credit of making such discriminations in favor of the United States. The inconsistency of predicting that the measure would destroy the revenue, and insisting that the duties articles would continue to be imported from the same source, through more extensive channels. The inconsistency of explaining against topics and remarks which may awaken passions, and endeavoring themselves to alarm our fears; of exhorting the Committee to consult its judgment alone, and substituting for argument continued addresses to the imagination.

Particular pains, he remarked, had been taken to exhibit a picture of our national prosperity which might flatter our wishes and forbid experiments. It was readily admitted, he said, that there were many features in the face of our affairs which were proper themes of mutual congratulation, whether compared with the situation of other countries or with our own under other circumstances. And it gave him much pleasure to add, that the degree of prosperity we enjoyed, though not to be exclusively credited to the change of our Federal Government, or to particular measures under it, according to the exaggerations of some, was yet so far and so evidently the fruit of that change as to do honor to the people of America in adopting it. He mentioned two innovations, making part of the Constitution, which must alone have had a powerful effect in meliorating the condition of this country, to wit: the prohibition of paper money, or other violations of contracts, and the abolition of incoherent and rival regulations of trade among the several States. But notwithstanding the flourishing state of our affairs, when viewed under certain aspects, it was equally certain that there were others which suggested very different reflections.

He then went into a review of the actual state of our commerce, particularly in relation to Great Britain, and of the several injuries of another sort which that nation had superadded to her commercial restrictions.

He repeated, what he had formerly maintained, that there was more of reciprocity in the footing of commerce between Great Britain and other countries, and between other countries and the United States, than between Great Britain and the United States. To prove the first point, he remarked that in some instances Great Britain had treaties with other countries which defined and stipulated reciprocal privileges; in other instances, her restrictions were counterbalanced by laws imposing restrictions on her. To prove the second point, he remarked, that no other nation with which the United States carried on commerce had a Navigation Act similar to that of Great Britain.

With respect to the intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, there was, he insisted, a want of reciprocity throughout, that must strike the most superficial observer.

In the article of navigation this had been sufficiently pointed out, and, being admitted on all sides, need not be repeated.

In the trade between the two countries, our best staples, wheat and flour, fish and oil, salted provisions, which amount to considerably more than one-third of our exports, were shut out of her markets; whilst all her best staples, her woollens, her cottons, her manufactures of the metals, of leather, and of silk, were admitted on moderate duties, and enjoyed in a manner a monopoly of our market.

In the articles of superfluity mutually admitted, there was nothing to compensate the inequality in other cases. Our tobacco paid a tax of four or five hundred per cent., our rice fifty or sixty per cent., and our manufactures of every sort would not be admitted, if we were ever so able to send them. On the other hand, her superfluities were received under duties which in general did not exceed from seven and a half to fifteen per cent.

In the West India trade, besides the exclusion of our vessels, whilst her own were left free, there were a number of our productions which were not admitted into the market there, whilst our laws refused nothing that was brought into the market here.

He next turned his attention to the injuries and losses we suffered in other respects.

As he had not possessed himself of the evidence, he should, he said, leave it to those who had to show how far the Indians were or were not spurred on to war against us by the agents or partisans of Great Britain. It was a sufficient ground of complaint that the posts were wrongfully detained; that the detention had a baneful influence on the sentiments and conduct of the Indians; and that the supplies for their warfare were derived from a trade authorized by the British Government, and protected by the posts which of right were ours, and ought to be used for our defence. He combined this proceeding of Great Britain with the lawless seizure of our vessels under her instructions of the 8th of June last, observing, that whilst on one side she violated the laws of nations by carrying on a trade in contraband articles with those at war with us, she was on another side violating the laws of nations by intercepting our trade with those at war with her, in articles not contraband.

The Indian war, he observed, cost us annually a sum, exceeding by one million the sum that would probably be sufficient for the defence of our frontiers if the posts were in our hands. The fur trade depending on the posts might, he thought, be fairly valued at two hundred thousand dollars more.

The Algerine depredations appeared to have proceeded from the steps taken in pursuance of the views of the British Government. If they were not immediately pointed against us, it must have been known that our trade would be the victim. The evil, therefore, may at least be charged to an unfriendly disregard of our interests, if not to a positive hostility to them. The pecuniary amount of this evil cannot be rated at less than the expense of the armament proposed as a remedy. This is stated at six hundred thousand dollars for the outfit, and he did not expect that the annual expense would average much less; to which may be added, at a very low computation, for insurance, remaining after the armament, two hundred thousand dollars.

The spoliations committed on our neutral commerce by Great Britain must be of considerable, though very uncertain amount; and the consequential detriment to our trade in general, from these interruptions and dangers, of a very great, though equally uncertain amount. In order to bring both within a safe estimate, he said he would state the former at the limited sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the latter at no more than four hundred thousand dollars.

In addition to the foregoing estimates, he said there was another item which, though of a different character, fell under a comprehensive view of our situation; and, being reducible to an amount tolerably definite, ought to find a place here. He referred to the statement before quoted, from a Report of the Secretary of State, which showed that the loss to the United States, from a dependence on British bottoms for the carriage of their produce, was no less, annually, in time of war, than three millions two hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and, in war and peace, averaged no less than one million three hundred and ninety-two thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven dollars. Allowing about one-third of this carriage for the reasonable share of Great Britain, (and, for reasons formerly derived from the character of our exports, this was a full share,) the annual loss from the dependence might be called about one million of dollars. These calculations he recapitulated thus:

Indian war	-	-	-	1,000,000
Fur trade	-	-	-	200,000
Algerine depredation	-	-	-	600,000
Insurance not reduced by naval armament	-	-	-	200,000
British spoliations	-	-	-	150,000
Consequential detriment to our trade	-	-	-	400,000
Dependence on British bottoms	-	-	-	1,000,000

From this view of things, it was impossible to deny that, however prosperous the United States might be in some respects, they were in others laboring under violations of their rights and interests which demanded the serious attention of the Legislature. Besides the unreciprocal footing of their commerce, and the indignities offered them, it was seen that they were burdened with an enormous extra expense, and involved in unjust losses, amounting to more than three and a half millions of dollars a year; a tax nearly equal to the heavy one they had been obliged to impose on themselves. Having taken this view of our situation, he proceeded to consider how far a remedy was comprised in the resolutions before the Committee, by tracing the probable operation of them, if passed into a law. [In this stage of his observations, the hour of adjournment being nearly arrived, he sat down, with an intimation that the subject would be renewed.]

On the next day, Mr. M. resumed the train of his observations, and proceeded to explain the remedial operations of his propositions:

First. They will make the British nation sensible that we can, by just and pacific means, inflict consequences which will make it her interest to pay a just regard to our rights and interests.

To enforce this tendency, he enlarged on the ideas he had formerly expressed in relation to the dependence of Great Britain on the commerce of the United States, and the obvious and essential dependence of the British West Indies on the supplies of the United States.

On the latter subject, he entered into a particular reply to the member from Massachusetts, [Mr.
AMES,] who had argued that the British regulation of the trade between the United States and the West Indies was conformable to the principles of the Colony system, as established by the commercial nations of Europe, and could not therefore be reasonably complained of. 2d. That the West Indies could obtain supplies from other quarters, and did not therefore depend on the United States; and nay, that there was danger, by forcing these supplies into other channels, of our losing that branch of trade altogether. 3. That the trade would hardly employ more than a dozen brigs, and was therefore not worth contending for.

In answer to the first argument [of Mr. Ames]
Mr. MADISON undertook to show that Great Britain had not pursued but violated the principles of the Colony system. The true spirit of this system, he said, was to confine the trade between the pinent country and the Colony to their own vessels, and to allow as little trade as possible between the Colony and foreign countries; but when a trade with a foreign country became necessary to the Colony, to allow the foreign vessel the same carrying privileges allowed to their own. Colonies, he said, were to be considered as parts of a common empire. The trade between one part and another, as between London and Kingston in Jamaica, was to be considered equally an internal trade with the coasting trade between London and Liverpool, or the trade between different parts of the United States; and might, if deemed expedient, be equally restrained to domestic bottoms. But when a trade was opened between a Colony and a foreign country, the case was changed: the foreign country became a party, and had a reciprocal claim to the use of its bottoms, as much in the trade with the Colony as with any other part of the empire to which the Colony belonged. In support of this doctrine, Mr. M. referred to the example of every nation in Europe, except that of Great Britain which had American Colonies.
Denmark, Sweden, the United Netherlands,
France, Spain, and Portugal, had their Colonies, as well as Great Britain; and some of them were rigorously attached to the principles of the Colony system; yet not a single one of these nations had refused, whenever a trade was permitted at all between the Colonies and another country, to make the carriage common to the vessels of both the parties. Great Britain alone had attempted a monopoly in such cases for her own vessels. Her example, therefore, was an innovation on the Colony system, as well as an infraction of the rights of reciprocity.

In answer to the second position of Mr. Ames, he denied that permanent supplies of provisions and lumber could be derived from any other part of the world than the United States; not from the Northern parts of Europe, which either did not produce or were too remote to send them; not from the Southern parts of Europe, which depended themselves on the Northern parts and on America; not from Great Britain, which imported bread for her own use, amounting, one year with another, according to the report of the committee of the Privy Council, to the sum of near three hundred thousand pounds sterling, and was certainly not an exporter of lumber; not from Ireland, which could not pretend to rival the United States in any article but that of salt provisions; and this was so much dearer that a prohibition alone of ours could gain a market for hers. The gentleman had relied on the capacity of Ireland to extend her cultivation of wheat, so as to spare supplies of this article also. Such a revolution in her interior state was not very probable. But he ought at least to have remembered that, as the pasture lands of Ireland should be turned into wheat fields, her exports of beef would decrease in proportion as she might be enabled to export bread.

It was a waste of time, Mr. M. said, to disprove, by minute inquiries, the possibility of supplying the British West Indies from the old Continent on terms that would not be worse than abandoning them altogether. The truth was, that the gentleman [Mr. Ames] had, in this particular, gone beyond the most sanguine advocates of the British policy, Mr. Knox and Lord Sheffield themselves, who limited their ultimate hopes of supporting the West Indies, without the aid of the United States, to the remaining possessions of Great Britain on this Continent. He would proceed, he said, to show what foundation there was for the opinion of these gentlemen, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, in favor of this resource. And he was able to give the most full and decisive evidence in the case, by recurring to an authentic document of our own, from which it appeared that the Continental Colonies of Great Britain, instead of being able to furnish the West India Colonies, were themselves dependent, for the very articles wanted there, on the supplies of the United States.

In the official statement of our exports for the year as late as 1791, most of the articles sent to the British Continental Colonies were of a sort and an amount so directly to the point that he hoped the Committee would excuse him for repeating them in detail. He stated them as follows:

BREAD-STUFFS AND ROOTS.
Wheat, bushels	-	315
Rye, do.	-	2,201
Barley, do.	-	82
Indian corn, do.	-	80,734
Oats, do.	-	814
Buckwheat do.	-	26
Peas and Beans, bushels	-	1,418
Rice, tierces	-	84
Flour, barrels	-	27,197
Ship-stuffs, do.	-	2,515
Rye meal, do.	-	1,774
Indian meal, do.	-	2,396
Buckwheat meal, barrels	-	853
Bread, do.	-	29,200
Crackers, kegs	-	364
Potatoes, bushels	-	20
Onions, do.	-	525
MEATS, &c.
Beef, barrels	-	284
Pork, do.	-	351
Bacon, pounds	-	881
Fresh pork, do.	-	29,334
Fresh beef, do.	-	92,269
Mutton, carcasses	-	561
Tongues, barrels	-	33
Butter, firkins	-	80
Lard, pounds	-	5,720
Cheese, do.	-	1,826
LIVE STOCK.
Horned cattle	-	312
Horses	-	39
Sheep	-	1,517
Hogs	-	178
Poultry, dozen	-	361
WOOD.
Shingles	-	43,000
Staves and heading	-	128,000
Handspikes	-	2
Hoops	-	3,000
Laths	-	3,000
Blocks	-	100
Or-rafters	-	857
Tunnels	-	1,500
Oak planks and boards	-	14,267
Pine, do.	-	27,000
Maple and beach, do.	-	7,500

The total of the exports, including a few articles under other heads, amounted to $270,259.

Here, then, it is seen, that not only in the breadstuffs and meats of every sort, but in the articles of lumber and live stock, for which, by universal acknowledgment, the West Indies must depend either on the United States or the British Continental Colonies, the latter are so far from being a rival to us, or a resource to the West Indies, that they continue at this day to supply their own deficiencies from our market.

Mr. M. said that he should not have employed so much of the time of the Committee on this head, if the gentleman [Mr. Ames] had not attempted to revive the arguments with respect to Canada and Nova Scotia, which had misled Great Britain in her political calculations and her presented views. He had heard the language of the gentleman on this subject with astonishment.

That Mr. Knox and Lord Sheffield, British subjects, viewing the prospect with British eyes, at the distance of three thousand miles, in the year 1783, when little inquiry and no experiment could assist them, should have run into the error, was perhaps not so marvellous. But that an enlightened citizen of America, seeing with American eyes, living in the neighborhood, as it were, of the scene, in a State whose wharves afford proofs of the daily dependence of the British Continental Colonies for the necessities of life on the market of the United States, should, in the year 1794, adopt the opinion that those Colonies could supply the islands, after a trial of nine years had probably forced the authors of the opinion, Knox and Sheffield themselves, to abandon it, would be heard without some surprise, and must be considered at least as the fullest proof that the gentleman had not given sufficient attention to the present subject to claim that weight which was in general due to his observations.

Mr. M. said he was not less surprised at the second position of the gentleman from Massachusetts, viz: that the West India trade could be carried on by a dozen brigs, and, consequently, was not an object worth our pursuit. The plain answer to this argument was, to state the fact that the shipping entered in one year from the British West Indies was not a dozen brigs, but 107,759 tons.

Besides the immediate importance of this auxiliary resource for our navigation, he remarked, that there were two considerations which enhanced the value of the object: one, that as the West India articles could be brought cheaper in American vessels, they would come cheaper to American consumers; the other, that as our supplies would at the same time be carried cheaper to the West Indies, the people there could afford to consume the more of them.

It had been urged, that the proposed restrictions on the trade with Great Britain would produce clamors here as well as there, and that Congress might be obliged to recede, before the British Government would be under the necessity of doing so. To this Mr. M. replied, that he was under no such apprehension. He thought more favorably of the good sense as well as virtue of his fellow-citizens. On the side of Great Britain it had been shown there would be the greatest distress, and the least ability to bear it. The people there were not accustomed, like the people of the United States, to self-denying regulations. They would not have the same confidence in the justice of their cause. And it was particularly worthy of remark, that the people of Great Britain would be disheartened, and the Government alarmed, by reflecting, that their losses from the shifting of commerce into other channels, and not only of their manufactures, but manufacturers, to other places, would be permanent and irretrievable;
whereas, on our side they would be temporary sacrifices for durable and valuable acquisitions.

Secondly. The resolutions would have the effect of increasing our marine, and thereby at once cheapening and securing the carriage of our productions, and providing for our safety. These advantages, having been already sufficiently explained, need not, he said, be again developed.

It had been remarked by a member from Massachusetts, [Mr. Ames.] that if, as stated by a Report of Mr. Jefferson, Great Britain was so often at war, her wars, by depriving us of her shipping, would soon have the wished effect of replacing it with American shipping. This reasoning, Mr. M. said, supposed what was contrary to prudence and probability. What merchants would build ships which a peace, always more or less in prospect, would throw out of employment, unless it were for special purposes, where the momentary gain might outweigh the eventual sacrifice?

It had been said that our tonnage was proved, by the official returns, to be increasing with an unexampled rapidity. To this Mr. M. answered, that the increase ought not to be compared with other examples, but with our own natural faculties and reasonable expectations; that the increase of our population required an annual increase of at least five per cent.; that an assumption, by foreigners, of American names, had probably increased the apparent quantity of our shipping; that the war, or preparations for it, by withdrawing foreign shipping, had probably also had some little temporary effect; that the principal cause of the increase was the extension of our trade with the French Dominions, which some members seemed so little inclined to secure and foster, by measures which appeared to him best fitted for the purpose.

He reminded the Committee of an argument which had on former occasions been much pressed by several mercantile members, for encouraging our own navigation, to wit: that American vessels, from a spirit of enterprise and a union between private and public interests, would explore new fields of commerce and new markets for our produce, which foreign carriers would leave unattempted. The trade to China, opened by American vessels, had been often ascribed to this cause. Mr. M. said the argument seemed to be countenanced also by the present state of our Mediterranean trade, which had, since our Independence, been confined by the Barbary corsairs to foreign bottoms. Previous to the Revolution, when American vessels could be the carriers, the trade was very considerable. Since the exclusion of our vessels, though the carriage of our produce is safe in British and several other foreign vessels, yet this branch of trade had withered as much as most others have grown. In 1790, the exports cleared for the Mediterranean were but $11,726; and in the year following, the imports no more than $11,522.

Thirdly. Another effect incident to the proposed measure would be an additional encouragement to domestic manufactures.

A gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dexter] had said he could read no such tendency in the propositions. Mr. Madison thought it impossible to read the propositions with attention, and not perceive that they must have the like tendency with the other means by which manufactures had been promoted. If the duties already laid were calculated to produce this effect, an increase of those duties, in any instance, must have a tendency to increase the effect. In answer to the objection that a change in the policy of Great Britain might put an end to the additional duties, and enslave those who should proceed under the influence of them, he remarked: 1st. That the same might be said, in some degree, of the regulations now in force. A treaty with Great Britain might stipulate changes which would affect our manufacturers. But, as there was a just confidence that the interests of this class of citizens would in this case be attended to by the Government, it might be expected that equal attention would be paid to them in any other case. 2d. The progress of things in this country, and the probable accession of foreign manufacturers, might be relied on to support whatever undertaking shall have once got a footing.

Fourthly. The proposed resolutions would favor an advantageous competition and distribution of our trade among the manufacturing nations of Europe. At present, it may be said to be monopolized by one, so great is the disproportion of its manufactures which come to our market. That this is an evil has been admitted, and cannot be doubted. It exposes us to the greatest and most sudden embarrassments, from the caprice, the passions, the mistaken calculations of interest, the bankruptcies, and the wars, of a single foreign country. Many of these embarrassments are felt at the present moment. If it were possible to liquidate them into a pecuniary statement, it would be found that, in a permanent view of our interest, there would be economy in making very considerable temporary sacrifices, for the purpose of dividing our custom among a number of competitors. It was not true that Great Britain alone can supply the manufactures we want. France, the United Netherlands, and several other nations, are capable of supplying us with a variety of articles, as well as the nations from which they now come; and, if invited to our markets, by prudent encouragements in the first instance, will soon learn to fashion their manufactures to the wants and tastes of this country. The policy of favoring particular branches of trade, even at some expense, in order to guard against the evil of depending on a single one, was exemplified by the conduct of Great Britain herself. Although he viewed her discriminations generally, respecting us, in the light he had explained, yet he thought it possible that, in the instance of naval stores and ship timbers, it might be her intention to foster a rivalry in a more distant quarter, in order to provide against a casual privation of the supplies of a nearer quarter. These articles are as essential to the marine of Great Britain, as her marine is essential to her greatness. Were she to have no resource but in the Baltic, a war with the Baltic Powers might be fatal to her. It may be wise in her, therefore, to keep open the American resource, even at the price of a tax on herself. In this case, she must quarrel with both the Baltic Powers and the United States at the same time, before the supplies will be cut off.

A member from Massachusetts [Mr. Dexter] had not, Mr. Madison said, been very consistent in his reasoning on the subject. He had contended against all attempts to excite a beneficial competition, on the idea that no competition could be beneficial which would not spring up of itself; and yet he had warned us against the danger that Great Britain, by exciting a competition against the United States in those parts of Europe which most resemble the infant situation of our country, might establish new sources, from which supplies would afterwards spontaneously flow to her, without being ever again wanted from the United States. The same remark was applicable to the reasoning of the other gentlemen who had represented the danger of exciting a permanent rivalry for the West India market, in favor of Canada and Nova Scotia.

Fifthly. The plan of the resolutions tended to conciliate nations in treaty, or disposed to be in treaty with us, into arrangements still more favorable to our commerce. This argument had peculiar weight in relation to France. It had been said that Great Britain was our best customer. The fact, he said, was, that we were her best customer; but that France was our best customer. We consume more of British manufactures than any other nation in the world consumes. France consumes more of our productions than any other nation consumes. He referred to the statement he had before offered for proof of this. Her consumption was also of the most valuable kind; and, under favorable regulations, would be a very growing one. It consisted of wheat and flour, salt provisions, and fish; articles which were not admitted by Great Britain; and which, without the market of France, would glut every other. Of our fish, she consumed five-eighths of the whole exportation. Her use of our live animals was another important consideration. It amounted, in the list of our exports, to $32,795, for the year 1791. In the same year, the British demand amounted to no more than $32,415.

The superior proportion of navigation we enjoyed in the French channels of intercourse had already been shown. In examining the policy of cultivating and securing the French market, he said it ought not to be forgotten that the profits and revenue arising from the rum distilleries depended on an article obtained almost, if not altogether, from the French Dominions alone, and which was the only raw material of any consequence imported into the United States. It was paid for, also, as had been much urged on other occasions, by members on the opposite side, in the worst fish, which could find a vent in no other part of the world. The molasses imported into the United States, in one year, amounted to upwards of seven millions of gallons, more than one-half of which went into the State of Massachusetts. He took notice, also, of the article of sugar, as rendered of great importance by our habits and our finances, and of which more than one-half was supplied by the French West Indies. Out of 17,142,723 pounds imported, 9,321,829 pounds were received from that source. The residue came in the following proportions, to wit: Danish, 2,833,016 lbs.; Dutch, 2,707,231 lbs.; British, 2,280,647 lbs. That statement was taken from the imports of 1790, the only year he had been able to examine on this point.

It had been said, why grant privileges before a mutual grant should be secured by positive stipulation? Why throw away, by a legal regulation, what ought to be the price of treaty? He answered, that the legal regulation threw nothing away, as it was always revocable; that, in the present instance, it was only meeting the legal regulations of which France had set the example; that, instead of being a bar to treaty, such a course of proceeding, more than any other, would smooth the way to it, by explaining the objects and establishing a confidence on both sides; that it would be happy if, in all cases where treaties are in view, this open and conciliatory process could take the place of that reserve and mysterious negotiation with which the parties approach each other. Were Great Britain desirous of forming amicable arrangements by treaty, he asked, what reader or more prudent step could she have taken for the purpose, than to have followed the example set her, by holding out in her laws the spirit in which she was willing to meet us in negotiation?

Having gone through these explanations, Mr. Madison entered into a view of the principal objections to the resolutions proposed.

1. It was said they would diminish the revenue and endanger the funds.

With respect to the Public Debt, his general ideas had been expressed by several who had spoken before him. He acknowledged that he had disliked and opposed the modification given to it; but, after it had received the sanction of the law, he had entertained no other wish on the subject than that the Debt might be honorably discharged as fast as the circumstances of the country would permit. This, he was well satisfied, was the prevailing sentiment of the great body of the people. He did not believe that there was a single State in the Union, or any considerable part of a single State, that did not acquiesce (where they did not approve) in the provisions which had been made in behalf of the public creditors. At the same time, he was equally sure that it never was either meant by Congress, or understood by the public, that, in mortgaging the impost for their security, it was to be a hostage to foreign countries for our unqualified acquiescence in their unequal laws, and to be worn, as long as the Debt should continue, as a badge of national humiliation. The nature of the obligation could certainly import no more in favor of the creditors, than that the fund appropriated should be applied, as far as requisite, to their use, unless equivalent funds should be substituted; nor more against the public, than that all deficiencies in the funds should be made up, whether arising without or in consequence of a change in the laws. If it should happen, then, that in consequence of any measure, dictated by the general good, the impost should become inadequate to its object, all that could be exacted by the public creditors would be some other provision, that would supply the defalcation; and it ought not to be doubted that the people at large, whose good was pursued, would readily support whatever other provision might become indispensable. He had made these remarks, however, with reference to an event which he did not, by any means, admit to be probable. The more he had revolved the subject, the more clearly it appeared to him that a very operative addition might be made to the duties on the enumerated articles, without endangering the aggregate product of the importations. And he entirely concurred in opinion with those who had observed, that the greatest injury which could be done to the class of citizens holding the public paper was, to represent their interests as more to be regarded than any national considerations whatever; and to oppose to the latter even the most imaginary contingencies to the former.

2. It was objected, that the operation of the resolutions would be more favorable, in some instances, to nations in treaty than was merited; and more unfavorable, in others, to nations not in treaty, than was politic.

In answer to this objection, he observed, that Sweden and Prussia, two of the nations in commercial treaty, had but little intercourse with us; would be, in any respect, but little affected; and, besides, the treaties with them were limited to a short term, the greatest part of which had elapsed.

France and the United Netherlands, the two other nations to be favored, could not reasonably be grudging the advantages they might derive from treaties, for which we had long ago received a valuable consideration, in their assistance towards the establishment of our independence.

As to the nations not in treaty—Denmark would not be affected. She had no Navigation Act within the description of the resolutions, and could not feel the duties on manufactures. The whole of the imports from Denmark amounted, in the year 1791, to $9,957 only. Her islands, also, with which the trade is carried on in our vessels, depend for their subsistence on our market.

Russia has little or no shipping in our trade, and it would not be affected if she had, as she had no such Navigation Act. Her unwrought iron may come as before. Duck and sheeting are the only two manufactures on which the resolutions would sensibly operate; and, with respect to these, as will presently be observed, it would be easy to make special exceptions.

The Hanse Towns, having no Navigation Act, would not be affected in that respect. Linens are the only articles falling within the proposed enumeration; and might, if thought requisite, be easily excepted.

Spain has little shipping in our trade; has no Navigation Act, such as is to be reciprocated, and would not be sensibly touched by the duties on manufactures. She also needs our exports, and will be influenced by that consideration. It had been asked, why Spain, against whom we had complaints as well as against Great Britain, ought not to be equally an object of our regulations? He said that such a question could be best answered when the communications from the President relating to Spain should be taken up.

Portugal, like Spain, will not be affected in her navigation, nor sensibly, if at all, in the article of manufactures; and is, more than Spain, supplied with necessities from our market. According to Zimmerman, Portugal does not raise within herself more bread than will feed her three months in the year. It is certain that she depends much on external resources, and that occasions are frequent when she can find them nowhere else than in the United States.

Mr. MADISON said, he considered these explanations as a sufficient answer to the objection. He would add, however, that there were other answers, some of which had been before hinted, that would afford an option of modes for the exemption of nations not in treaty. Besides the opportunity which such nations have of removing all difficulties, by meeting us in liberal treaties, they may be provided for, either by limiting every part of the measure to nations having a Navigation Act; or by limiting it to nations within a geographical description—a practice familiar to the British code; or, by naming the nations to be excepted—a practice also familiar to Great Britain; or, by naming the particular articles to be excepted—a practice no less familiar to that nation. By some or other of these modifications, the Committee could be at no loss to accommodate the plan to their own sense of propriety and the public good.

Here Mr. MADISON took occasion to remark, that much of the argument against the resolutions had proceeded from an inattention to their import, and would be answered by a simple explanation of them.

The first resolution, which was immediately the subject of debate, decided nothing with respect to a discrimination between different nations. It declared only, in general, that the situation of the United States required something to be done in the way of commercial restrictions and duties; and yet it had been combated by many members, as if a vote in favor of it would involve all the embarrassing preferences which their fancies could suggest.

The succeeding resolutions, on the subject of additional duties on manufactures, and of a variation of the tonnage duties, were founded on a discrimination between nations in treaty and nations not in treaty, but admitted, as he had observed, of whatever modifications or exceptions might be judged equitable or politic. The proposed reduction of the tonnage of vessels in treaty had been suggested by the complaint made by France of the existing tonnage on her vessels, as exceeding the burden imposed by her on ours, as well as an unkind return for the commercial benefits of which the United States were partaking under her laws. At present, the tonnage imposed by us on all foreign vessels was the same. This would not seem to be right on any principle, unless the tonnage imposed on our vessels by all foreign nations was the same, which was not to be presumed. Whether the change he had proposed would be an amendment of the existing law was a point to be examined. It was certainly a part of the plan which he did not regard as the most essential.

With respect to the resolutions reciprocating navigation laws, it was evident, he said, that these had no reference to the question, whether a nation was in a treaty or not. They would operate equally, wherever there might be the same departure from the principle of reciprocity. If they should bear on one nation particularly, it would be because they ought to do so.

8. It had been much insisted, that trade ought to be free to find its proper channels, under the conduct of merchants; that the mercantile opinion was the best guide in the case now depending; and that that opinion was against the resolutions.

In answer to this objection, he said it was obvious to remark, that in the very terms of the proposition, trade ought to be free, before it could find its proper channel. It was not free at present; it could not, therefore, find the channels in which it would most advantageously flow. The dykes must be broken down before the waters could pursue their natural course. Who would pretend that the trade with the British West Indies, or even with Great Britain herself, was carried on, under the present restrictions, as it would go on of itself if unfettered from restrictions on her part as it is on ours? Who would pretend that the supplies to the West Indies, for example, would not flow thither in American bottoms, if they flowed freely? Who would pretend that our wheat, our flour, our fish, &c., would not find their way to the British market, if the channels to it were open for them?

It seemed to have been forgotten, that the principle of this objection struck at every regulation in favor of manufactures, as much or even more, than at regulations on the subject of commerce. It required that every species of business ought to be left to the sagacity and interest of those carrying it on, without any interference whatever of the public authority. He was himself, in general, a friend to this theory, but there were a variety of exceptions to it, arising out of particular situations, as must be admitted by all who would mingle practical with theoretic views, and as has been already decided by a number of our laws.

With respect to the mercantile opinion, he was disposed to pay all due attention to it. The mercantile class of citizens was certainly an enlightened and a respectable one. Their information ought always to be received with respect and their interest protected with care. But it did not follow that their opinions, even on questions of trade, ought to be consulted as an oracle by those who were equally bound to watch over the interests of every class of citizens, and over the joint concerns of the whole. There were considerations of different kinds which suggested caution on this subject.

However intelligent and constant the merchant might be in directing his operations for commercial purposes, he might not be equally in the habit of combining with these the various other rational objects which the Legislature might be bound to consult.

The interest of the mercantile class may happen to differ from that of another class, and possibly both may differ from that of the whole community. For example: it is, generally speaking, the interest of the merchant to import and export every thing; the interest of manufacturers to lessen imports, in order to raise the price of domestic fabrics, and to check exports, where they might enhance the price of raw materials. In this case it would be as improper to allow the one to judge for the other, as to allow either to judge for the whole.

It may be the interest of the merchant, under particular circumstances, to confine the trade to its established channels, when the national interest would require those channels to be changed or enlarged. The best writers on political economy have observed, that the regulations most unfriendly to the national wealth of Great Britain have owed their birth to mercantile counsels. It is well known, that in France the greatest opposition to that liberal policy, which was as favorable to the true interest of that country as of this, proceeded from the interest which merchants had in keeping the trade in its former course.

If in any country the mercantile opinion ought not to be implicitly followed, there were the strongest reasons why it ought not in this. The body of merchants who carry on the American commerce is well known to be composed of so great a proportion of individuals who are either British subjects, or trading on British capital, or enjoying the profits of British consignments, that the mercantile opinion here might not be an American opinion; nay, it might be the opinion of the very country of which, in the present instance at least, we ought not to take counsel. What the genuine American mercantile opinion would be, if it could be collected apart from the general one, Mr. M. said, he did not undertake positively to decide. His belief was, that it would be in favor of the resolutions.

It could scarcely be necessary, he said, to add, that his remarks were not meant to be, as they were not in fact, the least reflection on any part of the mercantile order among us. They only supposed what, in political reasonings, ought always to be supposed, that the prejudices of birth and personal interests will be a bias on the judgment.

4. It had been an objection to the resolutions, that they might deprive us of the aid of British capital and credit, which were necessary to the prosecution of our commerce.

Mr. M. did not admit either that the effect would happen, or that it would be ruinous to our commerce.

Unless Great Britain should, of her own choice, put a stop to the commercial intercourse with us, which, for reasons before given, would be so much more hurtful to herself than to this country that it never could be presumed, the resolutions would operate only by abridging some of our importations, and by varying the channels of others. Her capital, as far as requisite here, might continue to be employed here.

On the general question concerning our dependence on British capital and credit, he observed, that it could not be denied that more use was made of them at present than was either necessary or beneficial. Credit, when extended to consumers, as was the case throughout the Southern States, was extremely injurious, as had been well explained by a member of Virginia. [Mr. Nicholas.] and as he himself had equally witnessed; when confined to merchants, it might, within certain limits, be an advantage. But it was not only his own opinion, but that of better judges, that the credit given to our merchants was at present excessive and injurious.

In order to form a very precise judgment on this subject, it would be necessary, he said, to calculate the amount of our own capital, and its proportion to the amount of our trade. This was a thing, he supposed, which could not well be done. If he had concurred in the doctrine of which so much had been heard both within and without doors, that a funded debt and banks of discount were equivalent to active capital, he should have a ready answer to the difficulty. The paper of the two kinds in the United States cannot amount to less than one hundred millions of dollars, whilst the amount of our exports or our imports does not exceed one-fourth of that capital.

It is true, a part of both the public and the bank stocks is in foreign hands; but, with the most ample deductions on that account, the residue, if operating in any considerable degree as active capital, would be a competent resource.

As he did not, however, view the doctrine in the particular light in which it had been painted, it would be more to his purpose to observe, that there was certainly in this country a real mercantile capital to a very respectable amount; that this was fast increasing with our increasing population and wealth; that if the foreign capital of one country should be withdrawn, the vacancy would probably, by degrees, be occupied by that of other foreign nations; that, if it should happen otherwise, there was reason to believe that a restriction of our use of foreign credit would be rather salutary than disadvantageous; that in fine, as long as we had twenty millions of dollars worth of produce, wanted by other nations, and were willing to take for it twenty millions worth of what they wished to part with, he was under no apprehension that the means of effectuating an exchange would not be found. Both merchants and capital would quickly be generated by such a state of things, if they did not previously exist.

5. It had been observed by several members, in allusion to the alleged proportion of British manufactures, consumed by us to the entire mass of her manufactures, that Great Britain would never part with her Navigation Act, in order to avoid a loss of four per cent. in the demand for her manufactures.

To this objection he answered that the comparison ought to be of our consumption, not with the entire mass of her manufactures, but with the part entering into her foreign trade; and then the loss would not be four per cent., but at least twenty per cent. That this would not be the only loss she would sustain, if she should be unwise enough to stop the intercourse between the United States and her Dominions; that it had been already shown, that when she apprehended a restrictive system on our part, she was willing to prevent it, by relaxing her restrictive system; that in times of war, when an adherence to that system would distress her, she frequently suspends her Navigation Act; that at this moment it is suspended in relation to the West Indies; that there could be little doubt, if the temporary necessity were likely to be made permanent by firm and judicious measures on our part, that the remedy for it would be made permanent also.

6. It was objected that the present was an improper time for such resolutions.

The principal reason given for this was, that the negotiation between the Secretary of State and the British Minister here was still depending. To show that this reason was unsound, Mr. Madison went into an historical view of what had passed in reference to commercial arrangements. He read the Message of the President to the House of Representatives on the 14th of February, 1791, acquainting them that steps had been taken to ascertain the dispositions of the British Court on the subject, and that there was no ground for favorable expectations. He stated that, in consequence of this communication, a committee was appointed, who reported that foreign vessels ought not to be allowed to bring into the United States any articles not of the produce or manufacture of the country to which they belong, and that an additional duty of 12½ cents ought to be laid on all distilled spirits, the production of any country or place from which vessels of the United States were not permitted to bring them; that, it being very near the end of the session when this report was made, it was referred to the Secretary of State, with an instruction to report at the next session an account of the foreign commercial regulations affecting the United States, with his opinion, &c.; that at the next session a letter was received from that officer, intimating that, in the actual state of circumstances, the report would not be given in, unless called for by the House; that, at the present session, the report now before the Committee was given in without being called for, and was, therefore, a proof that the circumstances which had caused the delay had vanished, and that at present there was nothing in train, according to the opinion of the Secretary of State, which ought to restrain the Legislature from proceeding in the business.

In answer to suggestions, that the British Minister had, in the correspondence with the Secretary of State, lately communicated by the President, manifested a favorable disposition, which has not been improved, Mr. M. referred to the passages which related to this point. He read from the first letter of Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Hammond, dated November twenty-nine, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, a paragraph requesting Mr. Hammond "to say whether he was authorized to conclude or to negotiate arrangements with us, which may fix the commerce between the two countries on principles of reciprocal advantage?" To this request, Mr. Hammond, on the thirtieth November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, answered, "That the King was sincerely disposed to promote and facilitate the commercial intercourse between the two countries, and that he was authorized to communicate to this Government His Majesty's readiness to enter into a negotiation for establishing that intercourse upon principles of reciprocal benefit." On December 6th he wrote to Mr. Jefferson, in order to prevent misapprehension, that, although he was not yet empowered to conclude any definitive arrangement with respect to the commercial intercourse, he still meant it to be understood that he was fully authorized to enter into a negotiation for that purpose, &c. The reply of Mr. Jefferson, on the 13th of December, informed Mr. Hammond that he had laid his letters before the President, and was ready to receive a communication of his full powers for entering into the negotiation, &c. This was followed, on the next day by a letter from Mr. Hammond, stating that he had no special commission to conclude any definitive arrangement upon the subject of commercial intercourse, but that he conceived himself fully competent to enter into negotiation, and the discussion of principles that might be the basis of such definitive arrangement; and that this opinion of his competency was founded on the instructions which were to regulate his personal conduct and the general plenipotentiary character in which he had been sent and received.

This letter, Mr. Madison observed, closed the correspondence on the subject of commercial arrangements, being justly considered by the Executive as a final proof that the powers of Mr. Hammond were incompetent and irrelevant to the object, and that it would be improper to open a formal negotiation with him under them. His instructions might be a rule and a warrant to himself, but, not being even exhibited, could be no evidence of his authority to the Executive; and his plenipotentiary commission, in the ordinary form, could never be understood as relating to the special objects he proposed to discuss. According to the usages of nations, a special commission is, in such cases, always furnished and required. Mr. Madison was persuaded that no sovereign in Europe would listen for a moment to such a claim as that of Mr. Hammond, and that the British Court would have been offended at such an one from an American Minister. He thought, therefore, that the Executive had equally consulted dignity and prudence in silently dropping the subject in the manner it did, until Mr. Hammond should receive and produce adequate powers in the accustomed form; as might reasonably be expected, if his Court was duly disposed to meet the United States in an amicable arrangement of commerce by treaty.

That the construction put by Mr. Hammond on his powers was inadmissible, appeared to Mr. Madison to result from the construction itself. Either the general plenipotentiary commission was to be taken in the technical and limited sense in which it is applied to the ordinary diplomatic objects of a stationary public Minister, or in a literal sense, without regard to such limitation. In the former sense, it clearly does not extend to negotiations for a treaty. In the latter sense, it would extend to the conclusion of a treaty, and not merely to negotiation, as Mr. Hammond explains and limits it.

Mr. Madison adverted next to the state of the correspondence relating to the Treaty of Peace. It appeared, he observed, that as long ago as the 30th of May, 1792, the Secretary of State had addressed to Mr. Hammond a full explanation of our rights and demands under that treaty; that, on the 2d of June, Mr. Hammond informed the Secretary that he should transmit it without delay for the consideration of his Court, and, accordingly did forward it in the course of a few days; that on the 13th of November, 1793, previous to the present meeting of Congress, Mr. Hammond was desired by the Secretary, in pursuance of a charge from the President, to let him know whether an answer could yet be given to the letter of May 29, 1792. Mr. Hammond replied that it could not, but he was confident the delay was to be ascribed to the continuance of the cause alluded to in a former answer to a similar request.

The cause alluded to was the interesting posture of things in Europe, which, it was said, had diverted the attention of the British Government to objects of a more pressing nature; and this consideration had been urged by several members as an apology for the silence observed towards the United States. Mr. Madison thought very differently. The interval between the receipt of the letter written by the Secretary in May, 1792, and the accession of Great Britain to the war against France, had been sufficient for the purpose of preparing and sending the proper instructions to Mr. Hammond. Mr. Madison added, that the prospect of being engaged in new controversies of a more serious kind, instead of justifying an inattention to an existing one, ought to have quickened the efforts for a previous settlement of the latter. This is the course dictated by prudence to nations as well as to individuals, and, where a right disposition concurs, it is the natural course.

It had been mentioned, as a further reason against the commercial propositions at this time, that they might draw upon us the resentments of the combined Powers. Mr. Madison could see no ground for such an apprehension. The combined Powers were pretty fully occupied with France. They could have no pretext for concerning themselves with us, in a case where we did not concern ourselves with them; and there was the less room for imagining that the combination could misconstrue the measure into an offence against them, as two of the parties, Prussia and the United Netherlands, were in treaty with the United States, and are favored by the propositions. 7. It was finally contended that, admitting our situation to be such as had been described, the mode proposed was an objectionable one.

Mr. Madison said he had no predilections for the mode, that could prevent his giving a ready preference to a better, if a better should be offered. And unless it should be said that the Legislature ought to adjourn without doing anything for the public relief, he thought it incumbent on those who objected to one proposition to substitute another that would be less objectionable. By this he meant a proposition not merely better in itself, but one that would probably be thought so, both within and without doors, and be more likely to coincide with the sentiments of every part of the Union, as well as to conciliate a majority of voices in the public councils.

The first question, he said, was whether anything ought to be done. If this he decided in the affirmative, as he presumed to be the sense of a majority of the Committee, and if war was not in contemplation, as, of course, was taken for granted, the next question could only lie between negotiation and commercial regulations. Negotiation, it had been shown, was in no train for prospect that could justify reliance on it. Commercial regulations alone remained. They would be pacific in their operation. They were the means best suited to the temper of our constituents; and he sincerely believed that, if judiciously framed, they would be more likely to answer the reasonable purposes of the community than any others that could be proposed.

Mr. S. Smith, of Maryland, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman: I shall make no apology for again taking up the time of the Committee in the discussion of a subject in which the best interest of America is involved—a discussion which has greatly instructed my mind, and which will tend to remove prejudices from others as well as it has from myself; for I will confess that, until the present subject had been discussed, I had conceived that the trade of America had struggled with many difficulties arising from the permanent commercial system of Great Britain; the inquiry has reduced the disadvantage on our commerce to one solitary object—that is, we are not permitted to carry our produce to the West India Islands. Nor shall I make any apology for following immediately after a gentleman of such powerful abilities; I shall not enter with him into a calculation of what value of our indigo imported into Great Britain is again exported when it composes the blue dye of their cloths, nor what value of our pot ash is exported from Great Britain after it has enhanced the value of their bleached linens. It is sufficient for my country that those articles have there found the best markets. It matters not the seller what the buyer does with the article, provided he pays for it. My habits in private life have led me to submit every proposition of gain to calculation; I use the same rule in public life. I asked what commercial advantage arose from the treaties? I see none but reciprocal protection and security. I asked what permanent disadvantage to our commerce from Great Britain, (the Power aimed at?) I am answered, the carrying trade to the West Indies; on which subject I will now address the Committee.

It is worthy of inquiry to know the advantages given by the different nations having Colonies in the West Indies, and the disadvantages arising to us from their restrictions. In the general term of West Indies I shall include the sugar Colonies on the Continent; and, first, Portugal permits no kind of intercourse with her Colonies of Brazil; she supplies them with flour from her own mills. Holland permits our provisions to Surinam and Demaram, but prohibits us from carrying from thence anything but molasses and rum. The consumption of provisions is but trifling. Spain excludes us from her Colonies, except in time of war, like the present, when she permits (by particular permission) the flour of this country, and allows our returns to be made in all the produce of the island. She supplies her colonies from Cadiz with our flour, and wheat she imports from France. Denmark permits our ships and cargoes of flour, meat, lumber, corn, &c.; and allows our returns to be made in any of the produce of her islands. From them we are supplied with a great part of the sugar we require.

[Here Mr. Madison said that, by the return of the year 1791, the Danish Islands only supplied two millions of pounds of sugar.]

Mr. Smith. I admit what the gentleman has said; for two years the crop at St. Croix had failed; but I still assert that, in common years, our great and certain supply of the best sugars is from the Danish Island—I mean in times of peace and tranquility. I will here observe, that Denmark, from whom we receive such marked favor, is implicated in the punishment these resolutions intend to inflict. France permits us, in times of peace, to carry in our ships to her West Indies fish, beef, live stock, and lumber, and to take our returns only in taffia and molasses; she prohibits our pork and flour, except in times of war and scarcity, when she permits us to carry both, and did permit us to make our returns in any of the Island produce, until the decree of the National Convention of March last, which limits our returns of sugar to one-tenth, and of coffee to one-fiftieth of our tonnage.

And here, Mr. Chairman, let me observe, that Republicans know their own interest better than Monarchs, and I quote their own decree to show it. France, regenerated France, will never admit you freely into her West Indies; if she would, I would give her the restriction proposed. But, sir, France can supply her own Islands with flour; it is her interest to encourage her own farmers. So far from expecting to supply France with flour, you must expect to meet her as a rival in that article in the markets of Europe. In that of Spain she has always been your only competitor, with a decided preference in favor of her flour. Then why calculate on France as a market for your flour? France gave orders for flour in 1772 from this country, but required no assistance from that period until 1787. As a proof that France will not give up her Colonial system, I will read you a part of two paragraphs from the report of the Navigation Act, by Mr. Barrero:

"The navigation of the Colonies, which entwines our seaports, and gives motion to all the works of industry, was participated in by foreigners, and we were calm spectators."

Again:

"To carry on ourselves the navigation of the Colonies is to profit by the abolition of our custom-houses," &c. Here Mr. S. was requested to read the third article of the Navigation Act, which he did, but was still of opinion that it did not, and would not, alter the Colonial system. It only went to the prevention of foreigners carrying anything but their own produce or manufactures, but gave no security to the admission of our trade freely to her Colonies. The introduction and explanation preceding the act showed clearly that they meant skill to have the monopoly of the Colonies. Great Britain draws from us in her own ships (only) all the flour, livestock, lumber, Indian corn, rice, &c., that she wants for her West Indies, and gives you sugar and rum in return. The flour, we are informed, amounts to from 45,000 to 60,000 barrels per annum, which might be carried by 12 to 15 brigs of 1,000 barrels, making each four voyages per annum. Shall we, then, quarrel with her because she will not employ our vessels to carry, when she takes from us so large a quantity of the produce of our lands? Can this be the interest of the farmers or millers of this country? If merchants supported this measure, they might with truth be said to be interested. She, in time of war or scarcity, permits our ships to carry to her Islands. It is said that Great Britain can obtain supplies of flour, &c., from no other country. It is true she now depends on the United States for supplies; nor do I wish to relieve her from a dependence that assists to secure to us her peaceable conduct; I doubt that policy which would induce us to push nations to the necessity of exercising their industry to supply themselves elsewhere with provisions. I have already stated that Portugal, during our Revolution, was compelled by necessity to erect mills, and has ever after refused to admit your flour. I will give another instance: Ireland, being cut off by our war from her usual supplies, turned her attention to farming; what has been the consequences? Why, she has become an exporter of wheat, and actually exports this year more than would supply the whole English West Indies. Suppose those resolutions should pass—may not England reject your flour (as France, Spain, and others do) and thus encourage the Irish to erect mills? At present, it is no object—for their flour would meet ours in competition. But remove ours, and what the consequence would be, must appear obvious.

The gentleman has said, that Canada can give no supply of wheat or flour. He quotes Lord Sheffield's book, written in 1784, for the government of our opinion in 1794; and he tells us that Canada is compelled to take her flour from the United States, and quotes the year 1791, when, from the wetness of their seed time, (in Spring) they had not been able to sow—one solitary year! As well might I say, that Philadelphia and New York took their supplies from Quebec, because a few years past, they actually bought large parcels of wheat there.

Sir, I well recollect in the year 1773, to have met wheat from Quebec in every port of the Mediterranean. In Barcelona, there were 50,000 barrels for thence for sale at one time. In future, Lower Canada will have no cause to fear, even if her Spring should be unseasonable; for Upper Canada sows the fall wheat, and last year actually (as I am informed by an American gentleman from Montreal) sent for exportation 300,000 bushels of wheat. The ordinary export from Lower Canada is 3 to 500,000 bushels. The same gentleman informs me, that the English companies, whose capitals are immense, have begun to erect mills. I ask if England, with those and other means in her power, may not be able to supply her West Indies? Sir, I say there is great cause to fear she will make the attempt.

The result of these observations is, that the general Colonial system of Europe is to monopolize to the Mother Country all the supplies she is capable of making, and particularly the carrying trade. France and Spain excludes your flour from their Colonies, and, of course, your carrying it. England takes all the flour her West Indies require, but reserves the carrying for her own vessels. I ask, then, which Colonial system, that of France and Spain, or that of Great Britain, promises most advantage to the farming and milling interests of this country? I ask, would any prudent nation risk the certainty of supplying 60,000 barrels of flour per annum, for the uncertainty of forcing Great Britain to permit us to carry it? The gentleman has stated that the favors to our trade in Great Britain, are only the same we enjoyed when Colonies. The continuing those favors to us when independent, certainly does not show any enmity towards the United States.

Mr. S. said, that he had already stated that the American tonnage had increased as rapidly as the capitals of our merchants and the number of our seamen would permit. But to be more particular, he would submit a statement of its progress, since the first year, of the advantages proposed by the existing laws, took effect; taken from the documents now before the Committee:

Account of all the tonnage entered in the United States, in the years 1790, 1791, 1792.

[JANUARY, 1794.]

1791, Decrease of Foreign,	17,128
1792, Increase of Foreign,	3,464
Total increase of American entries in two years,	89,192
Total decrease of Foreign, in the same time,	14,656

By this statement every member will see how rapidly our tonnage increased in 1792. Our merchants then had felt the advantages deriving from the existing laws to their shipping, and had completely risen from the languor occasioned by the insecurity under the former Government. The ship-builders, and the various useful mechanics necessary for the promotion of commerce, had again collected to the seaports, and met with full employment.

It appears that in the year 1792, there was a small increase of foreign tonnage; but did this arise from an increase of British tonnage? No, sir, on the contrary, it will appear by examining the document for 1791 and 1792, that the British tonnage decreased 5,619 tons, and that the increase arose from the French, who in 1791 supplied but 8,941 tons; in 1792, their tonnage amounted to 24,017 tons. Whence, Mr. Chairman, arose this sudden increase of French tonnage? Why, regenerated France made a stroke at our carrying trade, that proved a complete monopoly to herself of the carriage of all our tobacco wanted in France in her own ships; this she effected by laying a duty of twenty-five livres per cwt. on tobacco imported into France in American bottoms, when that imported in French ships paid but eighteen livres, making a difference of about 46s. 9d. sterling per hhd., when the usual freight of a hhd. of tobacco was but 32s. 6d. sterling to France in times of peace.

Mr. S. then asked, Has Great Britain laid any such discriminating duty? If she has, he would readily give his consent to retaliate. It will be conceived that 206,000 tons of British shipping entered in our ports, was still too great a proportion out of a total of 812,546 tons; but did this arise from the trade to her European Dominions from America? No, sir. It arose principally from her vessels employed to her West Indies, whose entries were three to four times per annum, and to her ships employed to the Mediterranean, for account of her own merchants. American ships cannot go there for fear of the Algerines; you, therefore, ought to be pleased at the competition that arises from their purchasing for the Mediterranean markets. A demand is created thereby to the great advantage of our farmers.

From experience, he would venture to say that nearly the one-half of all the American produce actually landed in Great Britain, is carried in American ships, and nearly the whole that is imported from thence. Is it not, therefore, unreasonable, Mr. Chairman, to repine because we have not the whole? It now becomes a subject of inquiry, to know how our own ships are employed. It appears by the document that there were employed from the 30th September, 1791, to the 30th September, 1792, to the ports of the Powers in treaty with us, actual tonnage, 145,295; to those not in treaty, actual tonnage, 143,089. Nearly an equal number of tons to each description. It ought to be observed that in that year there were 67,130 tons employed to the French West Indies. Only a small part of which ought to be counted on in times of peace. But for argument's sake let us adopt the statement as it stands; and what will be the consequence if the proposed discrimination should be adopted? Your third resolve proposes lessening the duty of tonnage on the ships of Powers in treaty; your fourth proposes raising the duty of tonnage on the shipping of Powers not in treaty. What advantages are to derive to the American shipping from those two resolutions? He could see none; but, on the contrary, he thought it fair to suppose, that the Powers aggrieved would retaliate, and what then would be the consequence? Why, 143,000 tons of our shipping would be subjected to pay twenty-five cents per ton, say, $35,750 per annum, by the resolutions, without any possible advantage promised by the system to our own shipping.

Mr. S. begged leave to submit one other observation, which ought to have weight. The document already referred to shows that 61,889 tons of American shipping were employed to England and her European dependencies alone—when to the European ports of all the Powers in treaty there were employed the same year but 26,790 tons. Why, then, would you risk a ground so dangerous, so delicate, as that of discrimination? It has been said that Spain and Portugal are not their own carriers, and therefore will not feel themselves offended. It is true they do not carry all they want from us, but they employ enough of their shipping to our ports to feel the affront. In 1791, they entered 9,098 tons. France the same year entered but 8,982 tons in our ports. Denmark, who is to feel the effect of those resolves, when Sweden, who entered 1,619 tons of their shipping, when Sweden, who is to be relieved, entered but 561 tons.

The result, then, sir, of this inquiry is, that no possible good can accrue to your navigation from those resolutions, and that much probable injury may take place from the retaliation of the Powers who cannot but think themselves aggrieved.

Mr. Scott said, that the subject might be reduced to a few simple questions; first, are we in such a situation as we have a right to expect? If this be answered in the negative, the second question is, can we better our condition? And third, are these resolutions the proper remedy? One leading feature in the Opposition is, that we ought to separate commerce from politics. This was impossible. It was curious to observe the opposite ground upon which these resolutions had been opposed. One set of gentlemen said, that they were so comprehensive and so formidable, that they would at once plunge us into a war with Britain. Another said, that they were such a milk-and-water piece of stuff, that Britain would look on them with a smile of contemptuous pity. He believed that Britain would submit to many restrictions and disadvantages, rather than give up our trade. Some gentlemen had said, that we did not consume to the value of more than two millions sterling; but, say that it was ten millions of dollars. The United States contain four millions and a half of people. Upon an average, their bedding and clothing was at least ten dollars each per annum. All the manufactures we had from Britain, supposing that they consisted of nothing else but clothing, were only ten millions, and the other thirty-five millions were manufactured in the country. But as in fact not more than one half of the very utmost of the importations from Britain, were of clothing of any kind, so, not more than five millions out of the forty-five, or one ninth part of the whole, was furnished from Britain. This demonstrated that, as to cloth manufactures, we were not in that humiliating state of dependence in which some people were so fond of representing us to be.

Mr. Sumn, of South Carolina, said, before he entered into a consideration of the arguments of the gentleman from Virginia, he should avail himself of the opportunity of correcting some misstatements of his own arguments, which had been made by that gentleman.

He had been represented as having stated it as a favor to this country, that Great Britain admitted our productions into her West Indies. Mr. S. said, he had only stated, that the exclusion of the productions of all other countries, was a preference given to ours, which was not given by the commercial system of France. He was also represented by the gentleman, as having argued, "that the United States ought not to complain of the usage of Great Britain, if she used them as well as other nations;" whereas, Mr. S. said, his reasoning went to show, that her commercial system placed us on a better footing than it did other nations. Again, he was made to say, by the gentleman, "that if Great Britain used us ill, she likewise used every other nation ill, and we therefore ought to bear it patiently." Mr. S. declared, he had said no such thing; he had argued only that the exclusion of our vessels from an indirect commerce with her, and from the entry into her Islands, was a part of her Navigation Act and Colony system, and extended to all other nations as well as the United States.

The gentleman, in advertising to his having taken for the epoch of his comparative view, the period antecedent to the pending French Revolution, as the settled order of things, had attempted, by an uncandid distortion of his argument, to wrest his reasoning from a commercial to a political subject, for the purpose of representing him as deeming the Monarchy of France the only settled order of things. It was true, he had confined his view of the two commercial systems to that epoch; in this he had only pursued the ideas and spirit of Mr. JEFFERSON himself, who, speaking in his report of the recent alterations in the condition of our commerce, says, "to have described all these, would have been as impracticable as useless, since the scenes would have been shifting while under description. I therefore think it best to leave the report as it was formed, being adapted to a particular point of time, when things were in their settled order, that is to say, the Summer of 1792." Mr. S. observed, that France was at the time a Monarchy, and he had been governed by the same idea as the Secretary of State, in stopping at that period, when a state of Revolution gave birth to changes in her permanent system, and induced deviations from what would be the ordinary course of things.

The propriety of limiting the view to that epoch was obvious, from the concession of the member himself, who, having stated that American vessels were permitted to be naturalized in France, and being informed by Mr. S., that the first National Assembly took away that privilege (as mentioned in the report) had been compelled to acknowledge the existence of fluctuations in her system since the Revolution. This view of the subject, Mr. S. said, was more favorable to France than one which should embrace the present period, her ancient commercial system being on the whole more favorable to this country than it is at this time. He had been also represented by the same gentleman, as "having admitted that it was a hardship to have our trade monopolized by one nation, and having at the same time advised to make no efforts for putting an end to it." This was directly the reverse of his sentiments, which was, "that it was advisable not to depend on any one nation for our necessary supplies, but that the proper remedy was by a mode, not the objects of the resolutions, nor contemplated by the report, namely, an efficacious system of encouragement to our own manufactures, and not subjecting our citizens to the expense of premiums for the encouragement of those of other countries."

Mr. S. then proceeded to take notice of Mr. MADISON's arguments. The gentleman had said that wheat and flour were admitted by a standing law duty free into the French West Indies. The report states the contrary to be the fact. "France," says the report, "by a standing law, permits her West India possessions to receive directly our vegetables, live provisions, horses, wood, tar, pitch, and turpentine, rice and maize, and prohibits our other bread stuff."

The gentleman had been much displeased at his having commented on the omission of the Secretary of State to mention, that, while the tobacco of the United States paid in Great Britain a duty of 1s. 3d., all other foreign tobacco paid 3s. 6d. As an apology for that omission, (which Mr. S. could not but deem material, especially as the Secretary laid great stress on other duties,) the gentleman had alleged, that the circumstance was perfectly immaterial, inasmuch as the duty of 1s. 3d. was itself so high as to diminish the consumption, and inasmuch as there was no other country which could be our competitor in that article. To this he answered, first, that tobacco being an article not of necessity but of caprice, and being consumed in small quantity by each individual, a high duty could not be felt; secondly, that tobacco was obtainable from other countries. It appeared, from documents of authority, that in the years 1744, 5, 6, the imports of tobacco into Great Britain had been annually about 62,000 hogsheads, of which only 44,000 were from the American Colonies, the residue, 18,000, being from other countries.

H. or R.]

Commerce of the United States.

[JANUARY, 1794.]

From the same documents it further appears, that in 1774, Great Britain imported from the American Colonies 96,000 hogsheads, which was nearly the whole of the tobacco she imported that year. The inference resulting from this circumstance is, that the difference of duty in favor of American tobacco had then destroyed a competition which did before exist. He admitted that this discrimination of duties in our favor was a relic of her Colonial system, but its object was to encourage the growth of tobacco in this country by giving to it a monopoly of the British market, and it appeared that this object was obtained; and it was to be inferred, that a continuance of the effect was procured by a continuance of the system. If we have not much competition now, it does not follow that it might not arise. What is there to hinder its being raised on equally good terms in any quantity in any of the Southern parts of this Continent in possession of the different Powers of Europe, Spain, Portugal, and Holland?

Portugal, it had been said, could not be our competitor, for she received our tobacco. The report says that it is prohibited. He understood some small quantity had been smuggled to that country; it was certain that only 62 hogsheads had been exported thither the year before last, and only five the last year. In comparing the footing on which our commerce stood with France and Great Britain, the gentleman had dwelt on particular circumstances. This was not a fair mode of comparison. The question ought to be an aggregate one; are we as well, upon the whole, with this or that country? If we are, we ought not to deal out a worse measure to one than to another. The indirect commerce which Great Britain denies us, and which France till lately granted us, is not at present very material to us, as we could not multiply our navigation enough to derive great benefit from it, without injury. To divert our capital from more profitable branches to the mere carrying trade would be unwise; it is desirable only to a country like Holland, of little production and great capital; but even France now excludes us from the indirect commerce with her by her late Navigation Act. The systems of the two countries, then, in respect to navigation in Europe, stand precisely on the same footing; and in respect to their West Indies, the war has let our vessels into the British, as well as the French Islands, and there can be little doubt that our right to send our vessels to the French islands will terminate with the war.

To depreciate the discrimination in our favor in the British islands, by the exclusion of the produce of other nations, the gentleman had said the exclusion was only a matter of form and a remnant of the old Colony system.

Mr. S. said, this was no answer to say it was a remnant of the Colony system. That system aimed at peculiar privileges to the national dominions; as for as we, being foreigners, still partake of those privileges, it is to our advantage. Suppose under that old system we had continued to enjoy the right of navigating to the islands, would it have been a disparagement of the right that it was only a remnant of the old Colony system? Neither was it true that it was only matter of form, and of no consequence. Though we can in general supply the islands better than other nations, it does not follow that others could not supply at all. The French Colonies could not get flour on as good terms as we can furnish them; yet that article was prohibited, and in general they were supplied from France. So, though in general the British Colonies could not be supplied equally as well as from us, yet in years of scarcity in this country, and of plenty elsewhere, a competition might injure us. Why could not rice, in particular, be supplied from the Portuguese Dominions in competition with ours?

Much reliance had been placed by the gentleman on the disproportion of American and British tonnage employed in the commerce between the two countries. He had stated that in 1790, the British tonnage was 211,000, the American only 43,000. But Mr. S. observed, the comparison was not accurate; the rule pursued by the gentleman was entry, not real tonnage; and as we have no direct tonnage with the British West Indies, from which entries are frequent, the British tonnage is swelled by that frequency of entries, as happened in the case of the American tonnage employed between the British and the French Dominions. The House having no materials before them, it was impossible to pronounce how far this circumstance varied the true proportion, but it was easy to see that it must do it greatly.

Arguments had been likewise drawn from the greater proportion of our tonnage employed in our trade with Spain, Portugal, &c.

Mr. S. thought the principle of comparison was a proof of nothing, except that Britain was a more navigating power than the nations in general with whom we have commerce. It was no test of the system of either. This was evident when we compared the proportion of our tonnage with Britain, and with Spain and Portugal; for, as the latter, equally with Britain, excluded us from their Colonies, their systems were essentially the same. But Britain has extensive means of navigation, Spain and Portugal slender means, so that while our bottoms were the principal carriers between those countries and us, Britain maintained a competition with us in the trade between her Dominions and us. But could it be proved that this was either avoidable in the present circumstances of the country, or that we ought to attempt to avoid it by violent or forced expedients? The navigating States in the European trade between the British Dominions and the United States preponderate greatly in the article of tonnage. Great Britain may have the advantage in the non-navigating States; this arises in a great degree from a cause which navigation laws cannot cure—the superiority of capital. The merchants of Britain can supply on long credits, what those of our navigating States cannot; they have more means to purchase and export the commodities of the South; from both causes they carry on a considerable part of the Southern trade, and they make their own shipping the instrument of it. No means calculated to multiply our vessels can, under existing circumstances, obviate this course of things. But the remedy of violent and forced expedients would be pernicious, if it could be successful. It would divert our capital in too great a degree from the better to the worse business; from agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, to mere navigation. The true course, he thought, was to foster our navigation by gradual and moderate encouragements, and to expect, from time and the increase of resources, the advantages of which we were solicitous. In the mean time, and till our resources could be better matured, it would be difficult to demonstrate that it was not a convenience to us to have the aid of foreign means. Mr. S., to strengthen his argument on this point, quoted a passage from Mr. JEFFERSON's letter to Mr. MORRIS, the Minister in France, in the printed correspondence, page 63, in these words:

He begged the Committee to remark, that this related to a British ship, and that they were the principal foreign carriers of our produce; yet the tendency of the gentleman's propositions went to exclude them from our ports. We receive from Britain, said the gentleman, whatever she pleased to send us, while she refused our principal staple. Mr. S. denied both these positions; they were not founded in any sense. 1. The staple alluded to was flour and grain. This the regulations of Britain excluded from her home markets, except in cases of extraordinary demand; but in her West India markets the staple was free, so that the assertion was much too general. Our flour and grain were admitted in those of her markets where perhaps it most interested us that they should be, where the demand was constant; they were subject to impediments in those of her markets where the demand would, from the nature of things, be only occasional; while France, on the contrary, by her permanent system, received this article only in her home markets, where there could be no demand for it in ordinary times, and excluded it from her West India markets, where there would be a constant demand. 2. It was not true that we received indiscriminately the manufactures of Britain. We endeavor to exclude, in the same sense that she excludes our flour and grain, (viz: by prohibitory duties,) all of them that we think ourselves able to supply ourselves with, for instance, candles, cheese, soaps, nails and spikes, steel, cables and cordage, boots and shoes, and, indeed, the manufactures of leather generally, beer and porter, and many other articles. The gentleman was astonished at the vast prevalence of British manufactures in the United States. But there was no ground for astonishment to those who attended to facts. The true and natural reason is, because Britain furnishes better, as to quality and price, than any other country, most of the more solid and useful kinds of manufacture, and those of the most extensive consumption; generally speaking, she was rivalled elsewhere only in luxuries and fripperies. Mr. S. said, if the gentleman had been astonished, he had been no less so at the idea of excluding British luxuries for French manufactures; from the best information he had obtained, the most solid and useful articles came from Britain, the frivolous, luxurious, and unnecessary ones, from France. He had procured from a merchant trading with France a copy of an order for a French cargo, such as is usually sent, and it supported him in his assertion. Mr. S. read the order, which consisted of fans, cambrics, lawns, lute-strings, modes and satins, silk stockings, shoes, shoe-patterns and slippers, walking-canes, watches, feathers and flowers, gloves, laces and edgings, ribands, tiffany, crape, hair powder, human hair for braids, combs, essences, perfumery, sweetmeats, mirrors, made-up millinery, gold and silver thread and spangles, gold and silver cord, ornamented fancy time-pieces, silk velvet, umbrellas, &c. These were the substitutes for the manufactures of iron, steel, wool, cotton, and leather, which the gentleman wished to exclude by the duties contemplated in his propositions.

The balance of trade was said to be against us in our trade with Britain, and in our favor with other nations. Mr. S. said, the ideas advanced as to this point were of the last century, and were now exploded by all enlightened politicians. The only sense in which the question could be interesting to us, respected the balance of our whole trade with all the world, not with a particular country. It was immaterial whether it was against us in this country, or in our favor with that; the inquiry should be, how it stood upon the whole? And, for it to stand well upon the whole, the best expedient, as it regarded our internal commerce, was, to get what we want where it could be obtained cheapest and best, and to have as great a choice of markets as possible for what we have to sell, by which means we secure the best price. Measures tending to change this course of things were the best that could be devised to render the aggregate balance disadvantageous to this country. Mr. S. illustrated his position by the following statement: Suppose the whole amount of our imports to be as 200, Britain furnishing 150, France 50; suppose our exports also equal to 200, Britain taking 75, France 60; here the balance of our whole trade, according to the rule adopted, would be equal. Suppose Britain furnished her manufactures ten per cent. cheaper than France, and that regulations were adopted which should have the effect of equalizing our exports and imports to and from both countries; Britain, in this case, would furnish only one-half of our imports, which would cost us the same as before; but France would have to furnish us with an additional quantity equal to what cost in Britain formerly 50; but, as commodities with her, by the supposition, are ten per cent. dearer, the same supply would now cost 55. Our account of imports and exports would then stand thus:

IMPORTS.
From Britain	100
From France, former supply	50
Additional supply of 50, transported from Britain, costing ten per cent. more	55
205
EXPORTS.
To Britain	100

Here it is evident the excess of imports to exports, on the same scale of supply, would be as five, so that what is called the balance of trade, before equal, would now be turned against us in the proportion of five. Thus the notable plan for giving us a more favorable balance of trade would end in rendering it less favorable, by diverting us from those sources where we can get supplied on the best terms, to others where we should be supplied on worse terms. Great Britain, the gentleman had assured the Committee, would not dare to contend with us, because we could, by our regulations, turn 250,000 of her manufacturers out of employ. But would not those regulations, and the counter-regulations which might be adopted, operate injuriously on a much larger number of persons in the United States? Would not all the owners and cultivators of land suffer materially by the loss of the best market for half of our whole exports? The evil to Britain would be partial, to us general, depreciating the whole landed property of the country. If there were expected a clamor in Britain which was to drive her Government into a repeal of her Navigation Act, we ought to anticipate a clamor from our farmers and landholders, when they found their produce rotting in warehouses, and were compelled to pay twenty-five per cent. more for their necessary supplies. When the gentleman stated the causes of failure of the attempt, in 1784, by separate States, to regulate our foreign commerce, he had imputed them entirely to the want of a Federal Government. But Mr. S. was of opinion that they were principally ascribable to the diversity of local interests and habits in the States. Did that diversity less exist at this time? Would it not produce similar effects? And would not regulations which might be pleasing to some parts of the Union prove so intolerable to others that they would not cease to complain till they could effect a repeal of the grievance? As far as the fact, then, with regard to past experiments, could guide, it was against the proposition. Former regulations produced inconvenience, and were abandoned. So jealous were the Southern States of this power in the hands of Congress to regulate trade, our navigation ten-fold. But would a vote of the House make that transfer? Would it create a demand for our exports in France which did not exist? Why had she not taken a greater proportion, hitherto? Was it not because she had not a demand for them? Great Britain, said the gentleman, could not obtain elsewhere the articles with which we supply her. Mr. S. examined this part of the argument under the different heads. Wood, viz: masts, spars, timber, boards, staves. It was less than thirty years since Britain derived her supply of those articles almost wholly from other countries, namely, Russia, Sweden, Norway, and Germany. The latter, through Holland, supplied the greatest part of Europe with oak timber, pipe, hogthead, and barrel staves, in which we have less to fear from competition than in respect to other articles; indeed, without some extra advantages, we could not well maintain a competition with the countries on the Baltic, in the European trade of wood, owing principally to our greater distance, which makes the freight much higher from this country than from the Baltic; hence, probably, it is, that we ship so little to France.

Tar and pitch. Britain used formerly to derive her supply of these articles also from the Baltic, principally from Sweden, and the same might be the case hereafter.

Indigo. This can be had from the East Indies, from all parts of the West Indies, including the Colonies of the Spaniards, Portuguese, and Dutch, on this Continent; great quantities of it, and of good quality, are produced in St. Domingo and Guatemala.

Tobacco. This article is raised in the Ukraine and other Southern parts of Europe, in the Florida, parts of South America, and in the West India Islands. It was true, the tobacco of this country was fitter for certain purposes than that of other countries. These particular kinds might find their way to a market otherwise sufficiently supplied, or even having a surplus.

Rice was formerly carried to Great Britain in great quantities from the Levant and the East Indies; some is raised in Spain and Italy. All the Spanish and Portuguese Colonies are fitted for it; a considerable quantity is raised in the Brazils.

Pot and pearl ash. Less than thirty years ago Great Britain was supplied with this article from other countries, viz: Russia, Germany, Sweden, Denmark, and Spain. The barilla of Spain is said to be a substitute for it.

The gentleman, as well as others, had mentioned the baneful effects of the credit given by British merchants. Credit, like other good things, is liable to abuse. Dr. Franklin, who well knew the circumstances of this country, bequeathed a part of his estate to be loaned out to young tradesmen and mechanics. He thought well of credit, and his testimony of its utility ought to remove some of the prejudices against it. If credit had produced pernicious effects in Virginia, as a member from that State had represented, it was certain that it had produced wholesome effects in other States. Why the same cause should produce such different effects in different parts, he should not inquire. As to its supposed influence on the borrowers, in creating an undue dependence, that remark had been well answered already. In truth, the borrower is, under certain circumstances, more apt to become the enemy than the dependent of the lender. An apprehension had been entertained by the gentleman that the existing commercial connexion with Britain would promote Monarchical principles in this country; and yet the professed object of the resolutions is to compel Great Britain to enter into a commercial treaty with us, and thereby strengthen and extend the commercial ties which already existed. The resolutions are, moreover, designed to induce the emigration to this country of thousands of British manufacturers, who will naturally bring their Monarchical principles along with them. But if a commercial intercourse with the Dominions of a Monarch are pregnant with such evils, we ought to abandon our trade with Spain, Portugal, and Russia, as well as Britain, and confine it to the Swiss Cantons and other Republics. Such apprehensions, however, he could not but consider as a poor compliment to the dispositions and character of the American people. They are too much attached to Republican Government and to their liberties to be exposed to the danger of losing either the one or the other by their intercourse with any foreign nation whatever. After some further remarks, Mr. S. concluded with saying, much apology is due to the Committee for having so greatly abused their patience; but when I consider that the proposed measures, unlike common Legislative acts, which can be repealed at pleasure when found injurious, must be deemed the corner-stone of a new Commercial Constitution, which, being once laid, we must, at all hazards, build upon or be disgraced, I am prompted by the strongest injunctions of duty to suggest every consideration which may induce the Committee to ponder seriously before they adopt them. My opposition is stimulated by a further consideration. Representing a district which includes an important commercial city, and a territory producing a staple valuable and bulky, many of whose proprietors have not yet emerged from the debts incurred by a ravaging war, and whose welfare depends on a ready vent for their productions, as well as a cheap supply of the indispensable articles of foreign manufactures, I feel a weighty responsibility on my mind on this occasion, and a peculiar solicitude to protect them against those embarrassments and distresses which appear, to my judgment, inseparable from the propositions, and which will operate against my constituents like a two-edged sword, by obstructing the export of their produce, and rendering more unattainable their necessary supplies.

When Mr. SMITH had concluded, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 30.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the copy of a Letter from the Governor of the State of North Carolina, together with two petitions, to which it refers, and which I am requested, by the Legislature of that State, and himself, to transmit to Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

Communications have been made to Congress, during the present session, with the intention of affording a full view of the posture of affairs on the Southwestern frontiers. By the information which has lately been laid before Congress, it appeared that the difficulties with the Creeks had been amicably and happily terminated. But it will be perceived, with regret, by the papers herewith transmitted, that the tranquility has, unfortunately, been of short duration, owing to the murder of several friendly Indians by some lawless white men.

The condition of things, in that quarter, requires the serious and immediate consideration of Congress, and the adoption of such wise and vigorous laws, as will be competent to the preservation of the national character, and of the peace made under the authority of the United States, with the several Indian tribes. Experience demonstrates that the existing legal provisions are entirely inadequate to those great objects.

G. WASHINGTON.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FORTNEY, Mr. PICKENS, Mr. MERRICK, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CLARK; and that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. AYES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for the relief of such of the inhabitants of Saint Domingo, resident within the United States as may be found in want of support; which was read twice and committed.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the appropriation bill; the discussion of the several sections being finished, a motion was made by Mr. FIRZIMONS, to add another clause to authorize the President to make a loan, under certain restrictions, to provide for these appropriations.

Mr. MADISON objected to connecting the two subjects. This, said he, involves a consideration of ways and means, and ought to be kept distinct from that of appropriations.

Mr. FIRZIMONS conceived, on the contrary, the objects inseparable. There is no use in making appropriations without money to pay them. The surplus revenue amounts to nearly two millions, but the Treasury does not at present contain more than $500,000, and a loan will, therefore, be necessary to anticipate the revenue.

Mr. CLARK observed that there was no necessity for a loan to pay the appropriation of the present bill, which provides only for the civil list.

Mr. MADISON concurred in the idea mentioned by the gentleman last up, and observed that the objects of appropriations, and ways and means, are so distinct, that it has been thought proper, essentially to separate them in the Constitution.

Mr. GILES conceived that a loan should not be entered into at least until the state of the Treasury is before the House. He was for deferring the proposition on the principles already mentioned.

Mr. FIRZIMONS drew a distinction between the subject of ways and means, and the object contemplated by the present motion, which he considered merely an anticipation of the revenue.

Mr. MADISON asked whether this money by loan is not to be procured by the payment of an interest of five per cent., and whether a tax will not be necessary to pay that interest?

Mr. CLARK assured the mover that he would side with him in his opinion, if he could satisfy his mind that this was not a subject of ways and means, and that the paper on the table would bring into the Treasury a sum of money without ways and means.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought it dangerous to hazard the Treasury's being empty, and approved of the anticipation proposed.

Mr. GOODRICH considered the subject in this light. The resources of the Government are about sufficient to defray its expenses, but as it gives credit to the importing merchants, an anticipation of the revenue is necessary by loan.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, exemplified the same idea by reference to private life, and moved to postpone the present question for the purpose of obtaining necessary information from the Treasury. It was then

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before this House an account of the moneys now in the Treasury, with an estimate of such further sums as may probably come into the Treasury before the first day of April next, and of the demands that will probably be made on the Treasury to that time; with a statement of the Domestic Loans.

After some further observations on the subject, the Committee rose and asked leave to sit again.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries; and after spending some time therein the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 31.

A petition of Thomas Pearson and others, proprietors of lands in the Territory of the United States, South of the river Ohio, was presented to the House and read, praying the attention of Congress to the subject-matter of a representation to, and certain proceedings of, the Legislature of North Carolina, respecting a claim of the petitioners to certain lands in the said Territory.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. FOSTER said: Upon the first statement of the propositions which have been so long under the consideration of the Committee, I was one of the individuals who had to examine the subject in the various lights under which it ought to be viewed, in order to form an opinion upon the necessity, the expediency, and the probable consequences of the adoption of the system which the resolutions contemplate. I have listened with unremitting attention to the debates, and have endeavored to a single observation of importance should not escape unnoticed. The resolutions, at first view, appeared important. On a critical and attentive examination, they do not appear less so. They confessedly involve a great variety of interests—interests of the highest magnitude—and, if adopted, will essentially alter the circumstances, the views, the commercial prospects, and the civil policy of the National Government.

The candor and ingenuity with which the subject has been discussed have given me great satisfaction. The arguments against and in support of the resolutions have been displayed in a manner highly gratifying to an inquiring mind. The variety of views in which the subject has been examined; its relative connexion with our agriculture, our manufactures, and the whole civil polity of the United States; the influence which the system would have upon our intercourse with foreign nations, and the probable effects resulting to them, more especially to France and Great Britain—have afforded much information; and I am happy in acknowledging my obligations to the gentlemen who have, with so much ability and precision, favored us with their sentiments. Much time, Mr. Chairman, has been already spent in the discussion. The subject is momentous and requires it. The affirmative and the negative of the question have been ably advocated and ably supported. A general review of the arguments may not, perhaps, be without its use.

In support of the resolutions it has been urged—that the measures of the tendency hereby contemplated have been long expected by the citizens of the United States. That the regulation of our commerce was the principle which first induced the formation and establishment of our present Constitution. That the adoption of the resolutions will probably excite a competition in foreign countries, as well as among our own citizens, operating to produce supplies of such articles as we may wish from other nations than those who now furnish us, and as an encouragement to the domestic manufacture of the same articles.

That they will tend to the increase of our navigation, enable us to obtain our proper share of the carrying trade, and enjoy those benefits and advantages to which, from our relative situation and existing circumstances, we are entitled.

That, by a pursuit of this system, we may injure the individuals, particularly the manufacturers, and, consequently, the Governments of other countries, and make our enemies feel the extent of our power, our abilities to injure them, and thence induce a proper respect for our rights and interests and our Government.

That the probable diminution of our revenues, from the possible diminution of our imports, would, in some degree, be counterbalanced by the increase of the duties contemplated by the resolutions.

That we are bound to obtain reparation for the injustice done to individuals of our own country by regulations contravening the Laws of Nations, made by some of the belligerent Powers; or, in default of obtaining such reparation, we are bound to compensate the damages which such individuals have sustained.

That provision is hereby proposed to be made for raising moneys to compensate, in the first instance, the individuals thus injured.

That leaving our trade to regulate itself is, in fact, leaving it to be regulated by foreign nations. That jealousy and ill-will have always marked the line of conduct of Great Britain toward America. She has never executed the Treaty of Peace; she carried away our negroes; she detained our Western posts; she excited and encourages the Indian war; she has let loose the Algerines; she has violated our neutrality, and committed spoliations on our ships at sea.

That the balance of our trade with Great Britain is now much against us. This has produced, on her part, an extensive credit, operating as a grievance, creating a foreign influence, which pervades the mercantile and trading part of the community, may extend into our public councils, and have an undue effect on our Government.

That we have all the necessities of life produced in our own country, and, consequently, have greater advantages in establishing such regulations, beyond what are enjoyed by a populous and manufacturing nation.

That, should the proposed system be adopted, and carried into effect, there is no probability of retaliation on the part of Great Britain. Should she be disposed, she cannot effect it. If the issue require self-denial, we can endure the evil with the greater advantage, and may safely calculate upon a complete triumph.

That Britain is now at war with Republican principles, and our commerce enables her to prosecute that war.

That the balance of our trade with France has always been in our favor. That friendship and disinterested benevolence have ever marked her conduct towards the United States.

That gratitude to the French nation requires us to turn the current of our trade from Britain to them.

That the system contemplated by these resolutions will induce France to confer on us additional favors. And, finally, that, by withholding our commerce from Great Britain, we shall aid the cause of the French, who are at war against despotism, struggling for liberty and the rights of freemen.

In opposition to the resolutions, it is said—That, though measures similar to those now contemplated, may have been heretofore expected, a necessity for their adoption does not now exist.

That regulations have already been made which have had a happy influence in increasing our commerce, our manufactures, and our navigation.

That our commercial advantages, our fisheries, our seamen, and our ships, have been progressively increasing since the adoptions of our present happy Constitution; that their numbers and growth are still increasing, and under the influence of the existing system, will continue to do so as rapidly as will be beneficial to the community.

That, although additional duties on foreign tonnage might encourage our navigation, yet the increase ought to be made with caution. A very great or undue proportion of American capital being vested in navigation would be hazardous, and, in case of a war, the loss would distress us extremely.

That an increase of our shipping beyond what is necessary for our importations, would be injurious. The surplus necessarily deducts from a capital which is wanted for other purposes, and may be more beneficially improved in the increase of our manufactures and agriculture. An excess of zeal to promote our commerce and navigation is more dangerous than a deficiency.

That it is the interest of the landholder that our trade should be free, and that foreign, as well as domestic vessels, should be admitted to our wharves, and permitted to receive our produce for exportation without restraint.

That, should additional duties be imposed, discrimination would be impolitic and unjust. The commerce of one nation ought not to be encouraged to the detriment of another. If there is no friendship in trade, it does not follow there must be enmity.

That, in establishing a commercial system, and forming a decision on the subject now under the consideration of the Committee, we should direct ourselves of political views. We ought not to suffer our resentments to influence us. The feelings excited by the consideration of the Indian war, the depredations of the Algerines, or the execution of the Treaty of Peace, have nothing to do with a subject which respects the regulation of our commerce only. To obtain redress for any political injuries we may have sustained, recourse, in the first instance, should be had to peaceable negotiations which would probably prove effectual.

That the object of the present resolutions appears to be a commercial warfare, which, in all probability, would be productive of one far more serious.

That the expediency of forming any commercial treaties may well be questioned. They necessarily connect us in the politics of Europe—a connexion which can never be salutary for America. But, if commercial treaties are formed, mutual interest should be considered as the fundamental principle.

That the resolutions before us contain only an affectation of aiding our navigation, commerce, and manufactures. They will, in fact, prove detrimental to each of them, by producing a temporary stagnation, at least, of the one, and unavoidable embarrassments upon the other.

That high duties, by augmenting the prices of such goods as might be imported, would only operate as taxes and burdens against our own citizens, who are the consumers; at the same time answering no valuable purposes to us with the Government of Great Britain, against which they are professedly pointed, nor offering any particular encouragement to our own manufactures.

That the goodness of a market is to be determined by the relative proportion of the dearthness or cheapness of the articles sold or purchased; and that, on a comparative view, the commercial system of Great Britain is more favorable to us than that of any other foreign nation. With respect to our exports, she is, and ever has been, a better customer than France, in the ratio of two to one.

That the restrictions complained of were in existence previous to our becoming an independent nation. They are, in fact, a part of her Colonial establishment, and still operate only as they respect her Colonial dependencies.

That the industry of our citizens has been, and is nourished, by the aid of a foreign capital, for which credit is an excellent substitute. So far from being injurious, it is highly beneficial, and, in the present situation of our country, has a happy effect in the promotion of ship-building, manufactures, and agriculture. Admitting it was an evil, it is merely a municipal regulation, and altogether beyond the control of Congress.

That Great Britain is able to supply us with such articles as we want, in great abundance, and on better terms than any other nation. She has it in her power, and is willing to give us credit. The French cannot or will not do it.

That the influence of British credit on our public councils is chimerical. The falsity of the idea is apparent by the part taken and so ably supported by the respectable gentlemen who represent a part of the United States which has received the most extensive credit.

That, should we be deprived of this advantage, merchants of great capitals only could trade. A monopoly by the wealthy would increase the prices of the articles consumed, and the enterprise and industry of young men, who have need of credit, would be checked and discouraged.

That the faith of the United States has been heretofore pledged, appropriating the moneys raised by certain existing duties to the discharge of public debt. A system, like the one proposed, tending to the diminution of the amount of those duties, would be a breach of faith, disgraceful as well as unjustifiable.

That the conduct of France, as respects our commerce, our navigation, and our fisheries, has uniformly evidenced a selfish policy; and that we have no privileges to boast of in consequence of our present existing commercial treaty with that nation.

This, Mr. Chairman, is a summary view of the principal arguments which have been adduced on the one side and on the other of the important question before the Committee. Many ingenious calculations, observations, comparisons, and documents, fraught with information, and tending to elucidate the subject, have been offered. I have listened with attention to the whole of them, and on a careful review, it appears to me that this is not the proper time for us to introduce very essential alterations in our commercial system; that, be our wishes what they may respecting the issue of the present war in Europe, neither duty nor good policy will permit us to become parties—the strict principles of neutrality ought to influence our conduct; that the measures proposed would have a very bad tendency; that they would produce great inconvenience to our revenues; a temporary stagnation to our commerce; a future augmentation of the shackles under which it now labors; deprive our fellow-citizens of enjoyments which they have a right to possess; turn industry from its natural channel; induce a necessity of land taxes for the exigencies and support of Government; prove injurious to public credit; be ruinous to our agriculture, and, in the present crisis, might precipitate us into a war—evils which justice, humanity, true principles of patriotism, the duties of morality and the best interests of our country, require us to deprecate, and, if possible, avoid.

I have endeavored to examine and consider the subject with candor. I have formed my opinion upon serious deliberation, and feel an impression of duty, when the question shall be taken, to vote against the propositions.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

Mr. GRIZZARD was of opinion, that, from motives of delicacy, the Committee should grant a short delay. He, therefore, moved that the question should be deferred.

Mr. FORREST considered that it would be unfair and uncandid to take the question in the absence of the gentleman who proposed the resolutions. He, himself, if he stood in the place of that gentleman, must feel extremely hurt at such a thing being done to him; and he would not use any gentleman so, because he would not wish to be used so himself.

Mr. SMITH, in all the public assemblies where he had ever been, had never been witness to any attempt like the present of taking the advantage of the absence of a gentleman to carry a question against him.

Mr. DAYTON replied, that he disdained any idea of this sort, and he did not care whether the gentlemen on the opposite side were to defer the question for a day, a week, or a month. He was willing to postpone it as long as they pleased. But he thought it a bad precedent, that any member, by choosing to absent himself, should stop the business of the House.

Mr. FITZSIMONS wished that the question might never be taken at all.

Mr. DEXTER spoke a few words to the same purpose. He did not think that the resolution had any meaning, at least he could not discover it; and, therefore, he did not think it worth while to take any question upon the matter.

Mr. CLARK said, that this was the thirteenth day which this question had been debated. The gentleman who was up last had, upon one of these days, engrossed the time of the House for more than an hour, and after having opposed the meaning of the resolution at such great length, he at last ter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill providing for the relief of such of the inhabitants of Saint Domingo, resident within the United States, as may be found in want of support; and,

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries: When

Mr. SWIFT moved, that the first of the resolutions, which was then before the Committee, should be struck out.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that the gentleman who had moved the resolution, and several other members, were not present; and he hoped for a delay, were it only of ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. DAYTON said, that it was the business of members to attend in their places, and if they did not choose to do so, the House were not to wait for them.

Mr. GRIZZARD was of opinion, that, from motives of delicacy, the Committee should grant a short delay. He, therefore, moved that the question should be deferred.

Mr. FORREST considered that it would be unfair and uncandid to take the question in the absence of the gentleman who proposed the resolutions. made this wonderful discovery, that it meant nothing! Mr. Boudinot wished the Committee to rise. Mr. W. SMITH regarded the precedent as a dangerous one. The absence might be intentional. Perhaps the gentleman now absent would likewise be absent to-morrow, although the question should be deferred.

Mr. SMITH expressed himself much hurt, that the member [Mr. MADISON] should be so treated in his absence. It was a sort of usage that could not be forgiven. He reproached the insinuation of the gentleman having fled the question.

Mr. WADSWORTH was sorry that the gentleman who spoke last should have been angry at the hint of members flying the question. It was certainly true that such things had frequently happened; and, therefore, it could be no harm to say so. There had been members on that floor who had fled the question. More than one, two, or three members had done so. There will be such characters in all ages and in all countries. A majority of the Assembly of Pennsylvania had once run away from a question. There were members who never could be brought to give a vote on a question of war. Congress had been sometimes forced to stop business for want of a quorum, on account of members flying a question. For himself, he looked upon it as a very bad precedent for the House to defer business on account of the absence of any member. He understood that he was this day to give his vote in a minority. He was against the resolutions for many reasons, with which he was acquainted before this debate began; and he was likewise against them for many reasons which he never heard till after the debate began. I know a member, said Mr. W. smiling, who is to give his vote against the resolutions, and who goes into the country this night. If the question is deferred this day, for the absence of one member, I shall try to get it put off to-morrow for the absence of this other member; and so I shall always be for putting it off till I can turn my minority into a majority.

Mr. FIDLEY rose in reply to what had dropped from Mr. W. about the majority of the Assembly of Pennsylvania running away from the question. [It was objected, that he was not in order, as he was not speaking to the question before the House.] Mr. F. replied that he was in order, as he was about to explain the nature of some facts which the gentleman had asserted. That if that gentleman was permitted to assert those things, he had a right to explain them, and appealed to the Chairman, who, as well as many of the members, acknowledged his right, and bid him go on.

Mr. F. said, that he doubted if the members had all as high a sense of honor, as standing their ground upon a question, as his colleague [Mr. SMITH] had suggested, though he acknowledged they ought to have it. He alleged, that members thus absenting themselves, was not peculiar to Pennsylvania. That in the Assembly of that and other States, and even in Congress, members had sometimes withdrawn from questions respecting war, upon the account of religious scruples, and had not, on that account, been censured. If it was wrong, it arose from the religion they professed. He expressed his surprise at the gentleman's assertion, that the majority of the Assembly of Pennsylvania had once run away from a question. That it must have been a very foolish majority, indeed, to run away from a question, which, by staying, they could have carried as they pleased. He supposed, however, that the gentleman was mistaken about the majority, and rather intended a circumstance peculiar to the late Constitution of Pennsylvania. By that Constitution, the Legislature, consisting of but one branch, two-thirds of the members were necessary to make a quorum. This, and the obligation to publish business of a public nature, from one session to another, were designed as checks to prevent party resolutions. In the early period of that Legislature, so many of the members as reduced the House below a quorum, frequently withdrew, to prevent hasty measures. On one occasion they withdrew to prevent a law from passing, without being constitutionally published for consideration. The doors being attempted to be forcibly shut, occasioned the affair to make some noise. Perhaps it was to this the gentleman alluded, but it was not a majority that withdrew. He said, that he admitted that in most cases the absence of members was a bad argument for delaying business, nor was it acknowledged by the rules of the House, but he thought that a regard to decency and propriety was always a rule. The present question had been debated for twelve or thirteen days in the space of about three weeks.

The question had often been called for, but when any gentleman suggested that there was anything further to be offered, the question was delayed without opposition. That before the House adjourned on Friday last, the question appeared ripe for decision, but a member who had been much engaged in the debates, suggested that another member wished to be heard, and the question was delayed. That on Saturday it was expected that many members would go out of town who would not be returned so early this morning. Though he acknowledged the right of the House to take the question at any time, yet he wished for a decent exercise of that right. Though he thought the member had a right to change his mind and decline speaking if he thought proper, yet he could not approve of first delaying the question at the request that the members might be heard, and declining to speak in order to favor a surprise. Though the House might decide any time, it ought not to prefer the most improper time that offered during the whole discussion. He said the Assembly of Pennsylvania, to which such free allusions had been made, thought it indecent to take an important question on Monday morning, knowing that several members having left town on Saturday night, had not returned. To punish absent members in this way was a poor argument. It was not the members that were punished, but the constituents. He said he did not know which side of the House had most members absent; he only wished a fair and full decision.

Mr. CLARK observed, in answer to the gentleman, that if they sat much longer on this question, he should have no feeling at all; for he believed they would all be petrified. He was for putting the vote immediately, that they might not be entangled in another debate of six days, to prove that the resolution meant nothing.

Mr. GILES rose and withdrew his motion.

Mr. MADISON had now come in. In answer to what had been objected against the generality of his resolution, he said that there were numerous precedents of that sort upon the Journals.

Mr. AMES replied to Mr. MADISON.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that he would vote against the first resolution; but some of the subsequent ones he approved. They had lost three weeks in debating upon the metaphysics of commerce. Let the resolutions be taken one by one. He hoped that the House would do something for the manufactures of the country. He was convinced that something might be done.

Mr. GILES said, that he would vote for the first resolution, but for some of those which went after it he would not vote.

Mr. MADISON spoke as follows: I owe many apologies to this House for rising so often, but since I rise only for explanation, I hope I shall be forgiven. I intentionally made the first resolution as vague as it is, and not more so. I regarded this generality of expression as necessary.

Mr. HEATH wanted the question taken, the gentlemen against the resolution were going off the question in a ludicrous manner.

Mr. DAYTON was against the resolution. The evasion was on the opposite side. The gentlemen for the resolutions were like some kinds of amphibious animals. If you attack them on the land they fly into the water; if you attack them by water they fly to land. As to the resolutions, he expected nothing but mischief from them. The people of the United States would set up manufactures. The restrictions would presently be taken off. British manufactures would pour in again. And those who had set up American manufactures would be reduced to beggary. The House would act in this case as the British House of Commons once did. They voted, "that the influence of the Crown had increased, was increasing, and ought to be diminished." But they had never acted up to this resolution, or done anything upon it. In the same way the gentlemen who vote for the present resolution will disagree to those that come after it. The business would end in nothing, and thus the House, by having adopted the first resolution, would make themselves ridiculous.

Mr. AMES said, the resolution was matter of moonshine, including everything, and concluding nothing. Now we are told by the mover that the first resolution pledged us to nothing. Therefore, we shall have nothing to do with it.

Mr. HEATH observed, that if he had entertained any doubts as to the propriety of the resolutions, those doubts would be now removed by the style of subterfuge adopted in the present debate by the members against them.

Here Mr. DAYTON, Mr. AMES, and Mr. W.

SMITH, rose together. Mr. SMITH was heard. He said that they had not been debating at all about the first resolution, but about the second resolution, ever since the discussion began. Mr. S. moved an amendment to the first resolution, which was that instead of the words "certain cases," be read "the following cases." He said that this amendment was necessary to make the resolution intelligible.

Mr. VENABLE said, it was in vain to deny, there was a subterfuge and a spirit of quibbling unworthy of Congress in these proceedings. A gentleman, [Mr. SMITH] had just now told us that the first resolution was unintelligible, and yet this very member had taken up two days on this very resolution, and now he rose to tell us that it had no meaning, and that he did not understand it. Mr. V. had listened with great attention to all that had been said, and thought it evident that a spirit of quibbling and of subterfuge had got into the opinion of the resolutions.

This charge was retorted from the gentlemen on the other side of the House. For which Mr. NICOLAS said there was no ground. As to blending political and commercial speculations, for which the friends of the resolution had been blamed, there was nothing unfair. In the very beginning of the debate, it had been stated, that they were a substitute for military preparations.

Mr. FITZSIMONS hoped the amendment would be withdrawn. It would sound strangely to the world, and place them all together in a singular light, if, when they had debated so long on a resolution, they should at this time be amending it, in a way as if they had not understood the meaning of it. Mr. SMITH withdrew his motion accordingly.

Mr. GILES did not wish to delay a vote. He had been both amused and astonished with the tone of distinction adopted by the gentlemen opposed to the resolutions. Political questions were the genus, of which commercial questions were a species. There was nothing unfair in connecting what it was impossible to separate. A spirit of quibbling had this day got into the House. The debate had taken a new turn, and a turn in which he was very unwilling to appear.

The question being loudly called for, it was put and carried, 51 votes to 46. The Committee then rose, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, February 4.

An engrossed bill, providing for the relief of such of the inhabitants of St. Domingo, resident within the United States, as may be found in want of support, was read the third time and passed.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of State, on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. NICOLAS desired to exclude by name all Powers except Britain, from the effect of the first resolution.

H. or R.]

Commerce of the United States.

[FEBRUARY, 1794.]

[Some gentlemen said it would apply to name Britain at once.] Mr. NICHOLAS said, that he had no objection to naming Britain.

Mr. MADISON observed, that he had at first avoided the particular mention of Britain, because he had been solicitous to conduct the business in as civil a way as possible. It was no concern to him whether Britain was specially mentioned or not. Her Statute Book had afforded many examples of that kind of style.

Mr. S. SMITH was at a loss to know what recent injury Britain had committed, which could justify this proceeding. In point of justice, Spain ought to be put on the same footing. She had laid restrictions on American shipping, that she did not impose on those of any other nation.

Mr. NICHOLAS answered, that the case did not apply to Spain; we enjoy a trade with her that is highly beneficial to the United States; nor have we any means of compelling her to alter her conduct.

Mr. BOURNEMORE strongly recommended that Spain, and the Imperial ports, should be comprehended in the restrictions. He had been against the original resolution; but since the measure was going forward, he wished that it might be conducted with propriety, and on principles as reasonable and equitable as could be adopted.

Mr. MADISON observed, that Britain had issued a Proclamation respecting the stoppage of the vessels of neutral nations; of these there were but three—Denmark, Sweden, and the United States. The two former had been expressly excepted from the consequences of these restrictions. The Proclamation was, in itself, a breach of the law of nations.

Mr. AMES was of opinion that it would be wiser to accept of excuses for injuries, than fight battles to avenge them. He likewise insisted that a train of negotiation had been entered into respecting the grievances of America, and that it would be proper to wait the conclusion of it.

Mr. MADISON considered the conduct of Britain as extremely atrocious. He read some extracts from the correspondence between Mr. Pinckney and the American Government. In these, the behaviour of Britain was represented as very arbitrary and tyrannical; and it was strongly stated, that there was not the least chance of obtaining redress from the Court of London, for the violence committed on the American flag.

Mr. DAYTON read some other passages from the same correspondence, and from these he drew inferences of an opposite tendency.

Mr. GILES read a passage from one of the letters of Mr. Pinckney, wherein that gentleman recommended commercial restrictions as the safest way of obtaining satisfaction from Britain for all the wrongs of America, since there was not the smallest probability of obtaining redress in any other way. Mr. P. expressed his extreme aversion to war, and therefore he suggested this method of retaliation, as a sure mode of distressing Britain, without the expense and danger of actual hostilities. Mr. G. asked, how in the name of common sense, gentlemen, after perusing such letters from Mr. Pinckney, could stand up, and pretend to say, that they had the smallest expectation of obtaining justice from Britain? He had been astonished at the language that he had heard in that House. Members had not scrupled to say, that the mere exercise of our political rights, as an independent Government, was equivalent to a Declaration of War against Britain. Why do we pretend to call ourselves a free or independent People? It would be much better, honestly and at once, to declare ourselves Colonies subject to Britain! The language held upon this topic was an insult upon the common sense of every American. We were entitled to exercise our own rights in our own way. He would rather hazard a war, than give up that right.

Mr. WADSWORTH was convinced, that Spain and Portugal deserved to be comprehended under the commercial restrictions as much as Britain, since they behaved as badly. Portugal, in particular, had acted with superlative baseness, for she did not, as in good faith she was bound, warn us beforehand of the approach of the Algerine Peace. It was true that the newspapers had teemed with preposterous praise of her generosity, but this was altogether a farce; because the papers before the House, which could not be printed, proved the contrary. It was strangely said, that Britain had made the Peace for Portugal without the knowledge of the Court of Lisbon—a circumstance quite incredible. Mr. W. asserted the conduct of Spain to be as mischievous as it possibly could be. The same remark applied to France, where the Captains of American vessels had been fined for attempting to obtain redress in a Court of Justice, against the captors of their ships. Nor did it proceed from any want of provisions, that they had seized cargoes of that kind. They had openly locked them up in warehouses for many months, and at the same time refusing to give the captains of the vessels any satisfaction. I really do not know (said Mr. W.) anybody, within whose reach we come, that does not despoil us. As to the Law of Nations, I leave that to gentlemen of the law—they may manage it; but he found it to be very uncertain. He was sure that all the world did us all the harm that was in their power; and he was not certain but what an open rupture with us will be acceptable to some of the nations of Europe. With regard to Spain, such a hostile disposition cannot be surprising, since every American newspaper that we can look into is full of projects for driving them out of the American Continent. He said that immense property depended on the decision of this day; he believed there never was a greater at stake, in any question which had ever come before an American Congress. He referred to the lawsuits at present depending before the British Courts of Admiralty for the recovery of the American property seized by the British pirates. He was convinced that, if the present amendment passed, the merchants of this country never would recover a farthing before the British Judges, of the immense sums for which they had lodged claims, which would be their ruin. There was one effect which the resolutions would produce, and that was, to drive a great part of our shipping out of employment. This he did not consider as a misfortune, for there was a much greater proportion of the mercantile capital of America engaged in that business than could be for the advantage of the country.

Mr. NICHOLAS, in reply to an argument constantly urged by the gentlemen on the other side of the question, said, that it was quite needless to speak of waiting for the result of an application to Britain. A thing has happened that puts all negotiation out of the question. A man owes you a dollar, you ask payment, and he robs you of an hundred. The affair of the Algerines puts an end to negotiation. The case was so bad, that after it no man could hope for amicable redress from Britain, or that after such baseness she would ever give us justice. With regard to Spain, there were two good reasons why we should not wish to offend her. In the first place, the United States gained largely by her trade; and, in the next, she was entirely out of our power. As to Britain, she was within our reach; and he was solicitous to except Spain and every other country from the restrictions, that their impression might be the more strongly felt in Britain.

Mr. W. SMITH again spoke at considerable length.

Mr. CLARK replied, that the gentleman from South Carolina had said that Britain was the most friendly to the United States of any nation in Europe; and that if a stranger came into that House, he would think the resolution under discussion was a manifesto of war against Britain. But, said Mr. C., (looking at Mr. SMITH,) if a stranger were to come into this House, he would think that Britain had an agent here.

[Here the gentleman was called to order.]

Mr. C. rose again, and repeated what he had said, appealing to the judgment of the House. He said that he had not named the gentleman as being a British agent; he had only said, that a stranger might think there was a British agent in the Committee. The gentleman [Mr. SMITH] had objected to the prolixity of the proposed amendment, in naming and excepting so many nations from the restrictions, and had recommended it as much better to declare, at once, that they were levelled at Britain only; it was putting twenty-five words where one would answer the purpose. Sir, (said Mr. C.) in cases of this kind there are often different opinions. He had heard the gentleman himself employ five hundred words, which, in his judgment, did not comprehend the meaning of one. As to the war, we had heard much painting, as if arms and legs were flying about our ears. For his own part, he was not afraid of hostilities: the reason perhaps was, that being much more advanced in life than some other members, he had less to lose by death. As to the present amendment, he regarded it as containing the essence of all which they have been debating about for thirteen days; and he hoped that the same gentlemen would vote for it to-day, who yesterday had voted for the resolution itself.

Mr. W. SMITH rose immediately after Mr. CLARK, and observed, that the member might have spared himself the trouble of mentioning his advanced age, as his garrulity was a pretty strong symptom of it. Whether he (Mr. S.) had, in the course of his remarks, employed more words than were necessary, the Committee would judge. They would also judge whether the incessant loquacity of that member was, in general, much to the purpose. With respect to any illiberal insinuations, they only excited his contempt. He had no doubt they were reprobated by the Committee, for they were intended to check the freedom of debate. But he declared, he would never suffer such attacks to deter him from that which he conceived a proper discharge of his duty. Mr. S. said it was astonishing that, after he had, from the commencement of the debate, so guardedly excluded all political topics, and confined his remarks expressly to commercial grounds, (considering the subject merely as a commercial one,) that there should be found any one so uncandid as to wrest his arguments from commercial and apply them to political facts. He had stated commercial facts, and had drawn inferences from them. If the facts were unfounded in truth, let gentlemen deny them. If his inferences were inconclusive, let gentlemen refute them. It was with much satisfaction he had, however, found, that all the commercial members who had followed him on the same side had, by their opinions and votes, borne testimony to the accuracy of his statements. Were those members, on that account, liable to the charge of undue partiality for Britain, and would they not, if such charge were made, be justified in recriminating? Would there not be as much reason to accuse the one side of being agents of France as the other of being agents for Britain? But he hoped all such remarks would, in future, be spared. The members on both sides were Americans, and had the same object in view—the public good—but they differed about the means. To substitute indecent personalities for argument was unworthy of any member; was an avowal of a want of argument, and merited the animadversion of the House.

Mr. SMITH was sorry to hear so much personal reflection cast out as the Committee had just now heard. He was convinced that the gentleman from South Carolina would despise it, as he was satisfied that every other gentleman in the Committee would do.

Mr. SMITH saw no difference between returning to the situation of a Colony dependent upon Britain, and that of submitting to be shackled as to commercial restrictions.

Mr. AMES said, that there was no commercial State in the Union which favored the resolutions: four-fifths of the citizens of the United States were against them. It had been urged, that they contained nothing new; nothing but what had long been intended to be carried into execution. An opinion against the resolutions was travelling with rapidity from this centre, on every side, to the circumference of the circle. The people had too much good sense to approve them.

Mr. MURRAY was surprised at the new turn which the debate had taken. Some days ago, the Committee had been amused and delighted with a splendid detail of the advantages to be secured to America, by the resolutions; but, since that time, the style had been reversed, and it was now frankly acknowledged that their sale end was, a system of hostility against Britain, and that it was the noble and patriotic passion of resentment which had produced them? But he was most of all surprised to see gentlemen going into a scheme which must blow up three-fourths of the revenues of the country. He could not imagine from what motives they were to cast themselves on their constituents in this way, or by what means they expected to be able to discharge the interest of the Public Debt. He was of opinion that no sinister motives of speculation in the Public Funds could influence that House. He was satisfied that it contained no speculators in paper, as had been asserted by the pen of calumny. He gave his hearty negative to the resolutions, in every shape. All the extensive information possessed by the gentleman who introduced them, all his abilities, and all the resources of his mind, had not been able to discover any method for discharging the interest of this Debt.

Mr. S. SMITH, Mr. DEXTER, Mr. HULLHOUSE, Mr. FRIZZMONS, and other members, spoke on the subject.

The Committee now rose, and reported progress, without taking a question on the amendment.

WEDNESDAY, February 5.

Mr. GILBERT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for extending the time for transmitting the oaths of absent owners of vessels, and for the relief of Thomas Jenkins and Sons; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. GOODHUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the remission of certain duties; which was twice read, and committed.

Ordered, That the Message from the President of the United States, of the thirtieth ultimo, enclosing the copy of a Letter from the Governor of North Carolina, covering a resolution of the Legislature of that State; as, also, the petitions of Thomas Person, and others, proprietors of lands in the Territory South of the river Ohio, and of the Trustees of the University of North Carolina, be referred to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. CARNEY, Mr. ORR, and Mr. PIERCE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed to report whether any, and what, alterations or amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act "to establish the Post Office and Post Roads of the United States," made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement of the moneys now in the Treasury, with an estimate of such further sums as may probably come into the Treasury, before the first of April next; and the demands that will probably be made on the Treasury to that time; with a state of the domestic loans, made pursuant to the order of the thirtieth of last month; which were read, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to take into consideration the act "to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," and report some provision in the case where any Judge of the Courts of the United States is, or may, by sickness or other disqualifying cause, be rendered incapable of discharging the duties of his office. Also, some further provision concerning bail, process, and costs, in the Courts of the United States; and, generally, to report such amendments to the said act, as they may judge necessary and Constitutional; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

A motion was made, that the House do now, according to the order of the day, resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. LYMAN wished that a delay might be granted, till advices should be received from England. It lay as a weight on his mind, that the House should proceed with so much rapidity. He had no design in wishing for a delay, but merely that the House might act with greater certainty; because, after they had taken some decisive step, intelligence of an accommodating nature might arrive from Britain, and cause them to regret the precipitation of their measures. He referred to the directions of the Executive to Mr. PICKNEY, to send a final answer to this country by the first of December.

Mr. BALDWIN recommended a delay during this whole session. He would not have sat silent during this discussion, as he had hitherto done, but from hopes that the subject would end in that way. It was his opinion, that this was one of those questions which had better be suffered to lie undisturbed for some time, as it would, by delay, be meliorated. Two years ago, when the question was agitated, he and some other gentlemen had persuaded those members, who were then extremely anxious for a measure of this nature, to postpone it. He had assured them, that they need not feel no alarm for their commerce and shipping, as they would unquestionably rise fast into prosperity. At the desire of these gentlemen, the report had been made. But, last session, it was considered as too early to produce it, satisfactory information upon some points not having been obtained. At the sitting down of this Congress, the report had been laid on the table. It would have betrayed an improper disrespect for the last Congress; for the Secretary who gave in the report, and for the gentleman, whose solicitations had brought it into existence, not to have paid it notice. But the predictions of Mr. B. had been fully realized. The alarm had subsided. The very members who had been anxious for reports and restrictions, were convinced, from experience, that their trade and shipping were in no danger. In spite of their severe losses by sea, they were all content to put up with them for the sake of cultivating the advantages of peace. Time had satisfied them with their situation; and if the subject should be suffered to sleep till another session, time would, in the same way, convince the other gentlemen, at present for the resolutions, that they were superfluous; he, therefore, advised to defer the consideration of the question. The parties had shifted sides, and would all, in the course of time, be of one mind.

Mr. SHERBURNE said, that he was one of only two members from New England, who had voted for the resolutions. He did so, because he believed them to correspond both with the inclinations and the interests of his constituents. If their opinion had been different from his, he would have resigned it, in deference to that of those who sent him into the House. Since he had given his vote, he had heard so many assertions, that four-fifths of the people of America were against the resolutions, that he was disposed to wish for a delay, till he had learned the real state of public sentiment.

Mr. CLARK thought it reasonable to grant a delay, if the member who asked for it [Mr. LYMAN] did not mean this, as an expedient, to put off the resolutions. It was proper that every gentleman should be, as much as possible, satisfied; and, besides, to postpone proceedings till advice came from Britain, was cutting off the right arm of arguments of the gentlemen in opposition.

Mr. TRACY begged that the resolutions might be deferred for this day, at least, because he had a report to lay before the House respecting the Post Office and Post Roads, which could not be delayed.

Mr. LYMAN declared that, in asking a delay, he had no motive but what he had openly stated. He did not wish to postpone the discussion for any other reason.

Mr. GOODHUE differed from the member from New Jersey, as to the refusal of redress by England cutting off the right arm of the arguments against the resolutions. He had not the least idea of redress in that quarter, as to the stopping of vessels with provisions for France. He had opposed the resolutions, but not from any idea of an alteration in that point.

Mr. LYMAN then moved, that the farther consideration of the resolutions be deferred till the first Monday in March next.

Mr. SHERBURNE seconded the motion.

Mr. FRIZZMONS said, that it was not in his mind, of the smallest consequence whether the motion was carried or lost; nor did he in the least care on which side his voice went. With respect to Britain, he had suffered by her severely. His property had been seized and carried into her ports, in contradiction to reason and to justice. He had not yet had time to collect the proofs of this, such as to enable him to make a regular application to the Government of this country; and he supposed that many other merchants were in the same situation as to this point. The prohibition of commerce between America and France by the combined Powers, was more injurious in idea, than in reality; and, that he might not be misunderstood, he should beg leave to explain himself. In fact, no merchant of this country would think of sending his property to France; for the Convention, many months before the proclamation of the combined Powers, had effectually prohibited the importation of the productions of America into France, by suffering no French products or manufactures to be sent out of France; nor, indeed, anything but assignats, which were of no service in the United States.

Mr. FORREST thought it extremely improper to defer or delay a decision; an alarm had been spread. It was proper to relieve the minds of the people. He wished to go into a Committee immediately; and, if that should be refused, he would have the yeas and nays taken on the question.

Mr. MADISON had no objection to delay. As to the resolutions, in answer to Mr. DAYTON, who had spoke of the versatility of the ideas of the mover, he said, that he had always reconciled himself to giving up some parts, and making partial sacrifices, provided the great principle was preserved.

Mr. FINDLEY, in a speech of some length, said, that, previous to the discussion on the resolutions, retailers had agreed to raise the price of goods for other and well known reasons, but that he had not discovered that the wholesale merchants had raised the prices.

Mr. FRIZZMONS contradicted Mr. FINDLEY, both as to this assertion, and another which he had made, that the merchants of Philadelphia were satisfied with the resolutions, which was contrary to the fact. He was authorized to say it was otherwise.

Mr. FINDLEY acknowledged, that he had said, that at least four-fifths of the merchants, whom he had an opportunity of conversing with, were in favor of the resolutions. That he was safe in saying so, and that he had been informed of so many more having the same sentiments as to justify him, in his opinion, that the merchants were not generally against the resolutions. That he had introduced this assertion in opposition to the frequent appeals that had been made to the opinions of the mercantile members of the House. He had always thought appeals to the opinions of those on the same side of the question, an improper argument. He did not admit, however strongly it had been asserted, that all the members engaged in commerce, were against the resolutions. And when he reflected upon the great influence arising from the mercantile accommodation of credit and assertions, so much urged by the member who took the lead in opposing the resolutions, and found so many merchants out of doors in favor of them, he was convinced of the truth of the observation of a member from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH,] that the merchants of the United States were more patriotic, and understood the Constitution and interests of their country better than those of other countries. For, when it was considered that the object of commercial pursuits was gain, and that merchants, as such, had attachments to every country, in proportion to the advantages they derived from it in trade; and that though they were, perhaps, more fully possessed of a general philanthropy, or of that kind of patriotism which embraces all mankind, yet, that they had not so much of that exclusive attachment to a particular country as other classes of citizens. He said that, when it was evident that such a vast proportion of mercantile gain and accommodation was enjoyed in the commerce with Britain, he was not surprised that so great a proportion of merchants were against resolutions calculated to narrow that commerce, or that some who were once in favor of them, had been persuaded to change their mind.

While he had not the least doubt that the merchants, with whom his colleague conversed, were against the measure, yet, he adhered to the truth of his former assertion. He said, it was not decent nor orderly to prove his assertion by mentioning names on the floor; but, if his colleague chose a private explanation, he would be convinced that the merchants who had declared themselves in favor of the resolutions were pretty numerous, and not inferior in respectability, nor in the extent of their commercial dealings, to those who were against them.

In reply to the assertion, that the price of goods had been raised in consequence of the resolutions. He said that there was a greater number of country storekeepers in town than usual at this season. That he had frequently accompanied them to the wholesale merchants. That they purchased the Manchester goods as cheap, and, in some instances, cheaper, than ever he had seen them. That, though woollens were a little dearer than he had sometimes found them, yet they were not sold dearer at the wholesale stores, since the discussion on the resolutions began, than they were when Congress met. That, therefore, his assertion, as far as it went, was founded on incontrovertible facts, and the testimony of respectable merchants. That it was well known that those who kept retail stores had entered into an agreement to raise the price of cloths previous to the introduction of the resolutions.

Mr. BOURNE, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SHERBURNE, Mr. AMES, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. BOUDINOT, also spoke.

The question was then taken to postpone the subject to the first Monday in March next; and it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 51, nays 47, as follows:

William B. Grove, George Hancock, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, Daniel Heiter, John Hunter, William Irvine, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Alexander Mebane, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, Joseph Neville, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. NAVS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, John Bant-ly, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Calwalader, Thomas Claiborne, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, Samuel Dexter, Thomas Fitzsimons, Uriah Forrest, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Wilkes Kitter, Silas Talbot, George Bland Lee, Francis Mallone, Joseph McDowell, William Vans Murray, Jeremiah Smith, Samuel Smith, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, Silas Trumbull, John E. Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gasebeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, John Watts, Paine Wingate, and Richard Winn.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 6.

A petition of Thomas Perkins and Company, of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that an additional duty may be laid on the importation of nails, or such encouragement given to the manufacture of the said article within the United States as, to the wisdom of Congress, shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. COIT, and Mr. HINDMAN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion, thereupon, to the House.

DIFFICULTY WITH ALGIERS.

After the reading of some private petitions, it was moved that the House go into a Committee on the state of the Union.

The draft of a resolution was handed to the SPEAKER, which had been drawn up by the committee appointed to examine the papers on the Algerine business. The substance of the resolution was, that certain parts had been marked by the committee as improper for publication; and, therefore, that, in the course of the discussion, they should not be referred to, or the reading of them called for, by any of the members.

A motion to this purpose was then made and seconded.

Mr. HUNTER said he would treat the committee as he would wish them to treat him. He had no design of condemning the committee; but he could not think of attempting to discuss a question where he was not at liberty to call for and examine the very materials requisite for deciding his opinion.

FEBRUARY, 1794.]

Difficulty with Algiers.

[H. or R.]

On motion, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The resolution being read for building four ships of 44 guns and two ships of 20 guns—

Mr. MADISON rose to inquire whether there was, in the public stores of the United States, a sufficient quantity of cedar and live oak for building the proposed six vessels? He was answered that there was not. Mr. M. then observed, that it was evident this fleet could not be ready for effective service in the course of the present year. He imagined that there was another resolution, precedent as to the time of voting it, which ought to be before the Committee. The resolution to which he alluded, was that assigning a sum of money to buy a cessation of hostilities from the Regency of Algiers. He was of opinion that the project of fitting out an armed squadron was liable to many solid objections. There were two points of light in which this subject might be surveyed. The first of these was, whether the Algerines acted from their own impulse in this matter? In that case, they were known to be in the habit of selling a peace; and, if they are willing to do so, he fancied that it might be purchased for less money than the armament would cost. On the other hand, if they do not act from their own impulse, but upon the instigation of Britain, we may depend upon it that they cannot be bought. Britain will keep them hostile. There is infinitely more danger of a British war from the fitting out of ships than from the resolutions on the report of the Secretary of State. The distance which the ships would have to sail is not less than three thousand miles, and their number is too small for a decisive advantage. The Combined Powers would embrace the equipment of these ships as an excellent opportunity to pick a quarrel with the United States. Mr. M. expressed his doubts with regard to the propriety of this measure, because the expense would be immense, and there was no certainty of reaping any benefit from it.

Mr. CLARK was anxious to state his doubts on this subject, that gentlemen, who, by their habit of life, had met with opportunities of better information than he possessed, might correct him where he was wrong. In the first place, the ships would be too small in point of number to be of any kind of importance, amidst the numerous navies of Europe. The distance from any friendly port, where, in case of accidents, they might repair, was likewise very great. It was to be expected that, when they fell in with British ships of war, that the latter would endeavor to search them for prohibited cargoes, and for seamen, because they were in the practice of impressing their own countrymen wherever they could find them. This would produce a quarrel. There was a scheme which occurred to him, and which he judged would be less expensive and more effectual. This was, to hire the Portuguese to cruise against the Algerines. He understood that the Court of Lisbon desired to keep her ships of war in actual service. The British have been in the habit of building frigates for the service of the Algerines, and, as he was informed, mariners at a distance upon sea, could distinguish in what country vessels were built by their construction. Hence it would be difficult for the captain of an American frigate to ascertain at sea a British ship of war from an Algerine. He had an objection to the establishment of a fleet, because, when once it had been commenced, there would be no end of it. We must then have a Secretary of the Navy, and a swarm of other people in office, at a monstrous expense. If we build six ships this year, we should next year find it necessary to build six more, and so on. The Combined Powers would find a much better pretence for a war by this armament than from the resolutions on the Report of the Secretary. Mr. C. closed his speech, which was heard with great attention, by observing, that he rose principally to submit his opinions on this question as hints for those who were better qualified to form a judgment on the subject than himself.

Mr. BALDWIN expressed his doubts as to every part of this subject. He had not been able to gain any information that was satisfactory. To block up the Mediterranean was, he believed, impracticable. Bribery alone could purchase security from the Algerines. Spain and Britain had always found this method the cheapest. He had much confidence in the gentleman who had been employed to go as an Envoy to Algiers from this country. He was a thorough man. Mr. B. had yet formed no decided opinion, and could wish to suspend his judgment till he learned the issue of the present application to the Dey. If bribery would not do, he should certainly vote for equipping a fleet.

Mr. NICOLAS feared that we were not a match for the Algerines. A small number of sailors were sufficient to navigate one of their ships, and they had a militia to man them who were innumerable. He had not been able to form an exact opinion, but he was afraid that we were not a match for them by sea.

Mr. S. SMITH rose chiefly to answer the interrogatories proposed by Mr. CLARK, as to what harbors in Europe American ships could retire to for shelter? In an early part of his life, Mr. S. said that he had been in that part of the world, and could assure the House that there was no want of proper harbors to refit or obtain provisions in. The first he mentioned was Toulon; Marseilles, likewise, had a most excellent harbor, and there was no doubt that our vessels would be received there in the most friendly way, as the Algerines had lately declared war against the Republic of France. Spain had, likewise, several excellent ports—Malaga, Cadiz, Barcelona, and Ferrol. In all these the American squadron would be heartily welcome, and meet with all kinds of naval stores in the greatest abundance. Lisbon, also, was a fine harbor, and Oporto would be proper for the same purpose. So that, in case of accident, the armament had nothing to fear from wanting a place of retreat. He had no doubt that our vessels and our sailors would both be much superior to those of the Algerines. Their ships were old and crazy, and were presents made them by the Powers with whom they were not at war. The American bottoms must be better; and our fleet will most likely have its station between Oran and Malaga, and, stretching across between those two ports, block up the mouth of the Straits. He adverted to the mistake of Mr. BALDWIN, who had said that Spain never attempted to block up the Straits; the proper answer to which was, that Spain had an extensive coast, not less than four or five hundred miles, within the Mediterranean; so that she was quite differently situated, with regard to them, from America. Mr. S. mentioned, as a consolatory circumstance, that our profit was twice as great at present, in commerce, as it was before the war, in spite of all the spoiliations committed by Britain and by Spain; and, if the war continues, the profits will continue to multiply twice as fast as they would otherwise do. As an evidence of this fact, he mentioned the high price of wheat at present in this market, and asked whether any gentleman had heard of a price so high at this season of the year before? A gentleman [Mr. NICHOLAS] had spoken of an Algerine militia. Why, sir, (said Mr. S.) I shall set down against them the American militia, and so that account is settled. He estimated that the whole American exports and imports, in round numbers, was twenty millions of dollars each; and that the extra insurance on account of the Algerines, from one end of the year to the other, would not be less than five per cent. on the whole, which was, altogether, two millions of dollars. From this Mr. S. inferred that it must be the very worst kind of economy to hazard an expense of two millions of dollars of insurance, for the sake of saving the charges of this armament. He did not see it improbable that the Algerines might very soon be on our coast, under the command of British or American renegades. It was nothing uncommon, among seamen, for two captains to be in the greatest friendship to-day, and plundering each other's vessels to-morrow. As an example of what Americans, in particular, are capable of doing, he repeated the history of a Mr. COOPER, of Virginia, who, some years ago, fitted out a ship for the express purpose of cruising against American vessels bound from or to the East Indies. He sent a person into the harbor of Algiers to solicit a commission from the Dey, and this Envoy had very near been taken prisoner, as the Dey wanted to have made a slave of him. Mr. S. said that Mr. COOPER was known to be a man of courage, of perseverance, and as possessing that species of intellectual resources which qualify an adventurer for bold undertakings. He inferred, from this anecdote, that, if Mr. COOPER, a man of respectable birth and connexions, could form such a scheme, what was not to be feared from the common set of seamen? He could not tell where the danger might end; nor did he know whether Philadelphia itself would be in safety. They might speak of their forts as much as they pleased; he knew their force, and did not much value it. The British had gone past them, and what was to hinder the Algerines, or such a man as Mr. COOPER, from getting past them? Were we on the coast of an enemy, he should have the least scruple of engaging to run a ship by such forts, when there was in view so great a prospect as the plunder of Philadelphia. He strongly pressed the necessity of sending out the proposed fleet as quickly as possible.

Mr. AMES attacked the mover of the resolutions on the Report of the Secretary [Mr. MADISON] for not displaying in the affair of the Algerines some part of the spirit which he had exerted on the other occasion. He thought it shameful to buy a peace, and that there could be no security, if we did. He recommended an armament. Portugal had shown herself friendly; and, referring to what Mr. CLARK had stated, he was of opinion she would give our ships shelter in her ports. He thought that six stout frigates at the mouth of the Straits would do the business. He went at considerable length into Mr. MADISON's resolutions, and condemned, upon various grounds, the arguments and conduct of the gentlemen who supported them. Yesterday, we were told that Britain durst not quarrel with America, and to-day, she is represented as ready to do it. Our commerce is on the point of being annihilated, and, unless an armament is fitted out, we may very soon expect the Algerines on the coast of America.

Mr. GILES, in reply, said that Mr. AMES drew inconsistent pictures. One day he represented the American commerce at the summit of prosperity; the next, it was reduced to nothing. In defence of the commercial regulations, he reminded the House that Britain, and not Algiers, was the real object of alarm, and the real source of hostility. It was, therefore, proper to provide remedies against both of these illustrious confederates. Algiers was but the instrument, Britain upon this cause. The reliance of Britain upon this instrument plainly showed that she was not equal to a war and a commercial contest. She had, therefore, turned loose the Algerines upon us—a fact which is pretty generally acknowledged on both sides of the House. It is, therefore, in the power of Britain to prevent the progress of these pirates. The commercial restrictions will reduce Britain to difficulty, and she will then, for the sake of friendship with America, be glad to put a stop to the Algerine ravages. Until some measure of this kind has been adopted, Britain, as she has raised up Algiers, will keep her up. The cheapest mode of getting peace will certainly be by embracing the commercial regulations. Mr. G. was averse to the proposal of a fleet. He agreed very much with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. CLARK,] that it would be a better expedient to hire the fleet of Portugal. He considered the establishment of a maritime force as having a direct tendency to war; whereas, the commercial restrictions had the same tendency to peace. The sending of American armed ships into the midst of the fleets of Europe would certainly produce a quarrel. It had been well remarked, [by Mr. CLARK,] that, if an attempt was made to search our ships of war, like our merchantmen, it would infallibly produce a public affront, and consequent hostilities.

Mr. MADISON, in reply to some remarks which had fallen from Mr. SMITH, respecting the present high price of wheat in the American market, said, that he had been informed of a place where wheat sold for four shillings and sixpence per bushel only, where the dollar passes for six shillings. Mr. M. supposed that Britain could render very essential service to the Algerines, without embarking in a war. She has not embarked in a war to the northwest of the Ohio, but she has done the same thing, in substance, by supplying the Indians with arms, ammunition, and, perhaps, with subsistence. He did not assert that Britain directed the plan of the Indian expeditions, for he had no explicit evidence that they actually did so. In the same way that they gave underhand assistance to the Indians, they would give it to the Algerines, rather than hazard an open war.

The Committee now rose, without coming to the question.

FRIDAY, February 7.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report whether any, and what, alterations, are necessary in the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels." Also, in the act, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same." Also, in the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels." And also, if any, and what, further legislative provision may be necessary for the securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas.

Ordered, That Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. FRIZZMONS, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOCKWOLD, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant Colonel Tonsard, made a report; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you an Act and three Ordinances, passed by the Government of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, on the 13th and 21st of March, and the 7th of May, 1793; and also certain Letters from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic, to the Secretary of State, enclosing despatches from the General and Extraordinary Commission of Guadaloupe.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 7, 1794.

Ordered, That the said Message and papers do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act providing for the relief of such of the inhabitants of Saint Domingo, resident within the United States, as may be found to be in want of support," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

THE NAVAL FORCE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The Chairman read the resolution before the House for equipping a Naval force.

Mr. MADISON thought this expedient unlikely to answer the purpose, and liable to many objections. Before the American squadron can be equipped, the truce between Algiers and Portugal must expire. When that expiration shall take place, she either will not renew the truce at all, or she will stipulate that the United States shall be comprehended in it. He would save the money intended for the fleet, and hire the Portuguese ships of war with it, as soon as the truce ends. He wished that the Committee might reject the present resolution, and when they did so, he would move a resolution, a copy of which he read to the Committee. It was in substance:

"That the sum of ——— dollars be provided to be employed in such a manner as should be found most effectual for obtaining a peace with the Regency of Algiers; and failing of this, that the sum should be applied to the end of obtaining protection from some of the European Powers."

Mr. M. considered the armament at present proposed, as quite too small to answer any efficient purpose.

A member here observed, that it would be hazardous to rely on Portugal; because though the truce might expire in about six months, it would possibly be renewed at the end of that time, or converted into a peace.

Mr. FRIZZMONS wished that gentlemen would pay some attention to attested facts, before they so abruptly declare that the six ships proposed by the Committee to be built and put into commission, were incompetent to the end for which they were designed. The Committee had bestowed considerable time in deliberating upon the best information which could be obtained, before they specified the force requisite to be employed, and they had been satisfied, that what was now proposed would be equal to the end. Here Mr. F. read a different statement of the ships of war in the service of the Regency of Algiers, at different times. One of these shows that in the year 1789, there were nine xebecs, from thirty-six to ten guns, and one ship of forty guns upon the stocks; but, that several of the xebecs were laid up or unfit for service. A second estimate of the Algerine maritime force had been transmitted by Mr. HUMPHRIES. He specified four frigates, two xebecs, and one brig. By advices still more recent, the fleet consisted of one vessel of forty-four guns, one of thirty-six, one of twenty-eight, three xebecs, and a brig. Mr. F. observed, that gentlemen had objected to the sending out an American fleet; that they could not always keep together. He reminded them, that from November to March or April, the corsairs of Barbary never go out to sea.

There were two months during that time, when they were restrained by their religion from piratical excursions. The Committee had been told, that the Portuguese are ready to assist us. There is ground to expect this assistance, but not to depend upon it. Two American frigates, along with the Portuguese vessels, would be fully equal to the task of curbing the Algerines. As to militia, he could not see of what consequence they could be in a naval contest. With regard to expense, he stated a very important fact. The United States import, annually, two millions of bushels of salt from these countries, which the Algerines will cut off from our commerce. The rise on that article must then be at least one dollar per bushel; which is a tax of two millions of dollars at once, or three times the expense of the armament. Probably, however, the loss may extend to four millions of dollars on this single article of salt, in one year only; a sum which would keep up the fleet a long time. We have been trying to buy a peace, but without success; and if we are not able to enforce it, the price of buying it must be so much the higher. As soon as Portugal is left to herself, she will certainly protect us, because it is much for her interest to do so. At present, she cannot, perhaps from the influence of the combined Powers. Mr. F. therefore recommended an armament in the mean time.

Mr. SMITH objected to this measure, because it was unequal to the task. Britain would assist the Algerines underhandedly, as she did an enemy in another quarter, and would continue to do so. He did not think she was shameless enough to own it, but she would do it. He spoke at some length.

Mr. NICHOLAS went on the same ground. He said that Britain had not been content with striking up a truce for Portugal, that the Algerines might be let loose on American commerce, but her Minister at the court of Lisbon had endeavored to prevent our vessels from obtaining a Portuguese convoy. Not content with insuring a loss to America, she had striven to make that loss immediate. As to the duration of the truce, it could not last long, for the Queen of Portugal had, in fact, broken it already. She had declared that the trade to that country should pass unmolested; to which condition it was not likely that the Algerines would consent. The Portuguese nobility had clamored at the acceptance of a truce. So that, on the whole, it could hardly last long. A naval force was a very expensive affair. The greater part of the immense debt of England had been lavished on her navy. He was against building a navy.

Mr. SWIFT had always been sensible that the situation of this country was not fit for war. We have a very heavy debt; but still it is better to bear debts than depredations. A gentleman of extensive information [Mr. S. SMITH, in yesterday's debate] had stated the rise of insurance as much less than the armament would cost. Britain had always more dependence on her navy than on the immense sums that she pays to these Barbarians. Mr. S. had no doubt that the proposed fleet would have its intended effect. He despaired of either buying a truce or buying an ally. As to the militia of Algiers, they could not be brought into action against frigates. He considered the charge of hiring the Algerines, as an unfounded accusation on the honor of Britain. He could not bring himself to believe that she was capable of a conduct so exceedingly disgraceful. He had no direct evidence to convince. It might be objected to this argument, that it would augment the National Debt and throw too much influence into the hands of the Executive Government. But the same objection might be started against every armament whatever.

Mr. MURRAY said, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON,] yesterday observed that he was not a little surprised, that those who a few days since had appeared so alarmed at the phantom of war, should on this question appear so willing to meet it. He would remark that those gentlemen were alarmed at a shadow which appeared followed by the substance of war, and were unwilling to do anything that might lead to a war that did not yet exist. But we were now at war with Algiers, and had no choice. They had been at war with the United States ever since the end of the Revolutionary war. The Spaniards and Portuguese kept them within the Mediterranean. Gentlemen who are averse to the report, hold up two substitutes measures: one, which was suggested, and has been argued by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON,] is, that we ought to grant a sum to Portugal for her protection of our trade. The other is, that commercial regulations will accomplish our protection. He liked neither. The last, if permanent, will withdraw all temptation from Great Britain to interpose her good offices. The first is worse; it is subsidizing Portugal at the expense of our own people, and that too without security. Gentlemen would make it the interest of Portugal to make such breaches of truce as would occasionally withdraw protection, and oblige us to subsidize her higher. It would create a disgraceful dependence on a foreign Power, and weaken the spirit of our marine; whereas, if you fit out frigates, you employ your money in nourishing the roots of your own industry; you encourage your own ship-building, lumber, and victualing business. He believed, that however true might be the suspicion of British interference in Indian affairs, and he feared it was too true, he did not believe the evidence as to Algerine interference strong enough to induce an argument against the report, under a supposition that as Great Britain had effected the truce, so she would aid Algiers against us. He thought so, because it was not now as much her interest as it was in times of peace. In times of peace, had she let loose the Algerines, her own navigation would have been enabled to carry for us, but now it would be molested by the French. He did not believe nations, more than persons, would do wrong purely out of evil designs devoid of interest; the greatest villain would not. At present, their ships are liable to attack from the French, and he had it from good authority, that so far were the British from having advantaged themselves if they had been so base, that scarcely a British ship had appeared since in our ports. The ship frigates would be able to blockade the Gut of Gibraltar; the Algerines did not sail in fleets; they wanted plunder, not glory; when they discovered they had to get the first by hard fighting, they would listen to peace, accompanied by money. Spain, it was true, had purchased a peace, but there was a hereditary inveteracy against Spain, and a facility of attacking her shores which we need not fear, so it was her interest to buy a peace when war could bring her nothing but a glory that almost disgraced her armies; as to jealousy of power in the Executive, he hoped to see a proper equipoise in the powers of this Government; but, when proper occasions occurred, he hoped Congress would never refuse the adequate means to enable the Executive to discharge its Constitutional duties.

Mr. GOODHUE observed, that the Committee had carefully looked over the statement of the marine force of Algiers for several years back, and had no reason to doubt that the six vessels would be equal to the purpose intended. There was no ground to suppose Algiers would have more force at present than she had during her war with Portugal. He had no doubt that the Algerines were let loose on the American commerce to prevent supplies going to France, and while the war lasts, we shall not be able to buy a peace. It is said, that the truce was but for a year, and in six months it will expire. He did not wish to depend on that when the evil is so great. And why depend on Portugal? She is more under the influence of Britain than any other nation in Europe. When Britain has been at the trouble of stipulating a peace for Portugal, will she suffer that nation to assist us? Certainly not. Or is it wise to stand by and depend upon such a resource?

Mr. MADISON said, that gentlemen thought so differently on this subject, and advanced arguments against his side of the question of such a different nature, that it was difficult or impossible to give them an answer. He then proceeded to quote the speech of Mr. GOODHUE; when that gentleman rose to explain. Mr. M. then proceeded to notice the speeches of Mr. FITZSIMONS and Mr. S. SMITH. Both of these gentlemen were up more than once to explain, as having been misquoted. In a speech of considerable length, he was not suffered long to proceed without interruptions of explanation. This produced a scene of altercation. One circumstance, however, was mentioned by Mr. FITZSIMONS that deserves particular notice. From April to December next, he said, the insurance on American ships from England and the rest of Europe, will not be less than twenty-five per cent. of their value on account of the Algerines.

The House now adjourned, without taking any question.

MONDAY, February 10.

A memorial of Samuel Swann, of the city of Richmond, in behalf of himself and others, was presented to the House and read, praying that an additional duty may be imposed on the importation of foreign coals, or such encouragement given to the opening of coal mines within the United States, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. COIT, and Mr. HINDMAN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the relief of such of the inhabitants of Saint Domingo, resident within the United States, as may be found in want of support."

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said amendment.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of the receipts and expenditures for the War Department, from the 1st of July to the 31st of December, 1793, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DELAWARE CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the Standing Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Latimer, of the State of Delaware, complaining of an undue election and return of John Patton, to serve as a member of this House, for the said State, made the following report:

"That the said Henry Latimer complains of the illegality of the said election on the following grounds, to wit: that the Legislature of the State of Delaware, in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, passed an act on the 26th of October, 1790, directing the election of a Representative for the said State in the Congress of the United States, by which it is enacted that every person coming to vote for a Representative, agreeably to the directions of the said act, shall deliver, in writing, on one ticket, or piece of paper, the names of two persons, inhabitants of the State, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same county with himself, to be voted for as Representative."

"That, at the said election in Newcastle county, a number of votes or tickets, containing the names of the said Henry Latimer and Solomon Maxwell, both inhabitants of the same county, were by the Judges of the said election, deemed illegal, and rejected."

"That, at the said election in Kent county, four votes or tickets, containing the names of the said Henry Latimer and George Truit, both inhabitants of Newcastle county, were, by the Judges of the election, rejected as illegal."

"That, at the election in Sussex county, a number of votes or tickets, not less than fifty, containing the name of John Patton only, as the Representative of the said State, were received by the Judges of the election, polled, counted, and included in the return of the said election; that, in consequence of the rejection of the said votes in Kent county, and the rejection of the votes before mentioned in Sussex county, the said John Patton was returned as exceeding the said Henry Latimer thirty, in number of votes."

"The committee find that the law of the State of Delaware, for regulating the election of a member to this House, contains the regulation stated in the petition, and that the said John Patton was returned to the President of the State of Delaware as having 2,273 votes, and the said Henry Latimer as having 2,243 votes. On examining the evidence taken in this case, the committee find the following facts in relation to the election in Newcastle county, to wit:

"That a considerable number of votes or tickets containing the names of Henry Latimer and Solomon Maxwell were rejected as illegal, as being both inhabitants of Newcastle county; the precise number of said votes is not ascertained. One witness, Robert Hamilton, who acted as an Inspector or Judge of the election, declaring that he kept a list of such rejected votes till he was fatigued; that when he discontinued, they amounted to upwards of seventy. Another witness, James Eves, who likewise acted as an Inspector at the said election, declaring that he first began to keep such a list of rejected votes, and counted upwards of thirty, when he changed seats with Hamilton, who continued to keep the said list, as above mentioned, and that he was informed by Hamilton, some hours before the reading of the votes was concluded, that the number of the said rejected votes then amounted to upwards of fifty. It appears, by a reference to official documents, that the amount of votes counted and polled at the election in the said county for Governor of the State, was 1,202, and the number polled and counted for a member of this House was only 1,138, constituting a difference of sixty-four votes. The committee find the following facts in relation to Kent county: That four votes or tickets having the names of Henry Latimer and George Truit, both inhabitants of Newcastle county, were, on that account, rejected as illegal; and that twenty-two votes or tickets, containing the names of John Patton and some other inhabitants of Kent county, were likewise rejected as illegal.

"The following facts appear in relation to Sussex county: that, at the commencement of the election in the said county, a question arose as to the legality of votes or tickets containing only one name, and, after some contest, it was resolved by the managers of the election to receive all such votes, and to leave the determination of their legality to the House of Representatives of the United States. It further appears by the evidence, that, on a late examination of the votes or tickets which had been polled or counted at the said election, there were sixty-eight single votes received and counted for John Patton, and nine single votes for Henry Latimer.

"From the above statement of facts, the following conclusions appear to the committee to result:

"That John Patton was returned as duly elected, by a majority of thirty votes.

"That, agreeably to the Election Law of Delaware, the four votes in Kent county, containing the names of Henry Latimer and George Truit, which were rejected, ought to have been received and counted for Henry Latimer; and the sixty-eight single votes in Sussex county, which were received and counted for the said John Patton, ought to have been rejected; that, if the aforesaid four votes in Kent county had been received, and the aforesaid sixty-eight votes in Sussex county had been rejected, as was required by law, the said Henry Latimer would have had, after deducting the nine single votes, received and counted for him in Sussex county, a majority of thirty-three votes. The committee are, therefore, of opinion that John Patton is not entitled to a seat in this House; they are also of opinion that Henry Latimer is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative of the State of Delaware."

to convoy the American merchantmen was not a proper foundation to say, that she had already broken the truce with Algiers, as had been alleged, [by Mr. Nicholson.] It was the established custom, in cases of this kind, to protect the ships that were trading to any particular country which happened to make a peace with any of the States of Barbary. Spain often did the same thing, nor was it complained of by the Algerines themselves. There was a great risk in depending upon so precarious a resource as the Navy of Portugal. He should be glad, besides adopting the resolution on the table, that the Executive might be authorized to engage the assistance of Portugal, if it was practicable. Mr. B. professed that he had met with no satisfactory evidence that Britain had excited the Algerines to the present war. He recommended the armament.

Mr. LYMAN was of opinion that the Algerines acted by the instigation of Britain. He would as soon question the existence of the resolution before them, as question that. The proposed armament must bring on a very certain expense, for a very uncertain advantage. He apprehended no danger from the Algerines, on the coasts of America. Though Britain might not venture openly to support the Corsairs, yet she could do it clandestinely, as she supported the Indians. He disapproved of the intended armament for many reasons—one of which was that though $600,000 had been stated by the Committee as the expense of it, that sum would not half discharge the expenses. He recommended that private individuals should be encouraged to fit out vessels for attacking the Algerines.

Mr. HULLHOUSE had heard of no expedient suitable to the end in view, except that of sending out a fleet. He ridiculed the project of attempting to encourage individuals to attack the Algerines. He asked if a Legislature in the possession of their senses, could fancy that private persons were to be induced to squander away their property in such a way, without compensation? Was there any body so lost to all common sense, as to embark in such an undertaking? As to the interference of Great Britain, he was willing to take that for granted. But could the members return to their constituents, and tell them that Congress could do nothing in this matter, because Britain had been the occasion of it? He observed that a more humiliating situation could not be conceived, than that of America becoming tributary to Portugal, and going there to tell her that Americans could not protect themselves. Such an application must wound the honor of the United States in a most sensible manner. Gentlemen had said, the other day, that Britain would submit to any hardship sooner than declare war against this country. It was now said by members on the same side of the question, that she will assist Algiers by sending her military supplies. These assertions are inconsistent. If Britain sends ships of war to Algiers, she must come to an open rupture with America, for he understood that, by the Law of Nations, it must be the consequence.

Mr. DEXTER found many difficulties in this matter; but he was willing to adopt the measure proposed, because he saw nothing better. Mr. HUNTER said that the damage sustained by trade, from the Algerines, is not so great an object as to deserve such an expense: especially since Portugal offers to protect that part of our shipping which is bound to and from her Dominions. It has been said by several gentlemen, that the only motive which induced Britain to make a truce with the Algerines was, to get the Portuguese fleet to join her in attacking their common enemy, the Republic of France. It had been said by one gentleman, that Britain had more interest to set the Algerines loose upon American commerce before the war than since. This was a very mistaken idea. Before the war, our trade with Britain, in regard to insurance, was upon equal terms. But as soon as Britain engaged in the war with France, the insurance on her own vessels rose very high. Her own insurance companies would not insure the freight of British vessels, and the property of her own subjects, on the same low terms that they would insure on American vessels and American property. This preference was extremely provoking to the pride of Britain, particularly as the nation thus preferred had been, but a few years before, her own subjects. Her seamen were likewise quitting her service for that of America. Thus, her carrying trade must have been cut up by the roots. It was no more dishonorable for America to get a peace made with Algiers by means of Portugal, than it had been for Portugal to get a peace in the same quarter by means of Britain. He did not think that Britain would ever suffer America to get a peace if she could help it, as long as the war lasted; for then America would take off the carrying trade. She could supply the Algerines with ships, under the pretence of being their allies; and then, when they were employed against America, say that she could not help it. Mr. H. was averse to the armament.

Mr. MURRAY could not believe that Britain had been guilty of any design of exciting the Algerines against the United States. It was opposite to her interest, and he could not believe any nation capable of such a crime only for its own sake.

Mr. GILES said that Britain was at length acknowledged to be the cause of the Algerine piracies. It was now said to be for the sake of reducing France. The baseness of the end corresponded with the atrocity of the measures employed to produce it; for he should always consider it as one of the greatest of crimes for one nation to attempt the subjection of another. As to the state of insurance, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HUNTER] had spoke rightly. Mr. G. said that with respect to what he had formerly observed, about Algerine militia, he had been mistaken. He did not intend to say that the four American frigates were to go to land, and give battle to a hundred thousand Africans; but if a nation could, by an effort, assemble so numerous a militia, they can surely produce a maritime force more than equal to four frigates. He could not think gentlemen serious in proposing to send them against Algiers. He adverted to the numerous dangers to which they were exposed by sea, at such an immense distance from their own country. It had been said by a gentleman [Mr. DEXTER] who, whenever he happened to be in the wrong, had a very happy talent at making himself appear to be in the right, that the inconvenience of seas and tempests would be no greater to the Americans than to the Algerines. But the member had overlooked this great difference: that the latter, if any accident befell them when he required a friendly port, were not far from home; whereas, the former had to sail 3,000 miles. A gentleman [Mr. S. SMITH] had mentioned several harbors of France, Spain, and Portugal, to which the American frigates might retire, if they wanted repairs. He was not sure that they would be welcome at present in the ports of either Spain or Portugal. As to France, from the measures that we seem lately to pursue, it is very uncertain whether she would much longer give the American flag a friendly reception. Gibraltar had likewise been held out as a place where the intended fleet might be sure of a hospitable retreat. But this, likewise, he thought very doubtful. He considered navies altogether as very foolish things. An immense quantity of property was spread on the water for no purpose whatever, which might have been employed by land to the best purpose. The old Government of France had been ruined in a great measure by the expenses of its navy. England groaned under a great part of her immense load of taxes from the same cause. He was persuaded that four frigates would not even form an additional motive to make the Regency of Algiers conclude a peace. He was afraid the Algerines would laugh at them.

Mr. S. SMITH said it was a singular example of integrity in the present age, and would be the wonder of posterity, that Captain O'Brien and Captain Stephens never had accepted of any offers from the Algerines. We have now been told that eleven ships are taken. Some of these are not commanded by natives of America, and it cannot be surprising if renegades are found among them. Portugal, with only three ships, had blocked up the corsairs: what, then, was to hinder America from accomplishing the same end with six ships? Where Portugal has one ship on the ocean, America has ten. She is, therefore, ten times as able as Portugal to beat the Algerines; and yet we are told that she cannot do it. He had one objection to the fleet: he wished that the two 20-gun ships had been made to carry 36 guns, as he fancied, from the shortness of their keels, that they would not be able to keep up with the 44-gun vessels. He said that the Algerines had no place of shelter till they got home, as they were not admitted into the harbors of any other nation. He asked, who would join this country, when we declared that we could do nothing? It was disgraceful to Republicans to be in such a situation. He was sure that this defenceless state was contrary to the maxims of the Republics of all former ages. He was sorry, when he heard gentlemen who called themselves Republicans, vindicate such pusillanimous measures. He suspected that they were at bottom friends to Monarchy, and wished to bring it back again. He then proceeded to demonstrate that America would lose infinitely more by the rise of insuranc, than she would save by setting aside this armament. He closed by once more asking, whether the United States could not perform that with six ships which the Queen of Portugal had performed with three?

The Committee now rose without coming to any decision.

TUESDAY, February 11.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill for extending the time for transmitting the oaths of absent owners of vessels, and for the relief of Thomas Jenkins and Sons; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. VENABLE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the remission of the duties arising on the tonnage of sundry French vessels which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the committee to whom were referred the memorials of the people called Quakers, at their yearly meeting, held in Rhode Island, in the year 1793; of the delegates from the several Societies for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, in convention assembled at Philadelphia, on the first day of January last; and of the Providence Society for abolishing the Slave Trade, made a report; which was read and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

FORTIFICATIONS.

A report was read from the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States.

It was moved and agreed to read the report a second time. The committee had not been able to complete their investigation; but, in the meantime, they recommended that the sum of ——— dollars should be assigned for the security of the harbor of Norfolk.

Mr. DAYTON objected to the adopting this motion without due consideration.

Mr. TRACY moved that the subject should be referred to a Committee of the Whole House; which was agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. TRACY had wished for more information. He supposed that the Committee would report nothing but authentic facts; yet gentlemen had objected to the report as not well grounded. He thought the committee right in the measure which they pointed out. If we are not able to defend ourselves, we must give up the trade; and if the interposition of Britain was a proper reason for not pushing the Algerine business, the same argument was sufficient for giving up the Western frontiers, because the Indians were said to be assisted by the British. In the same way are we to give up the sea, because Britain may possibly assist the Algerines, as well as the Indians? Are we not to defend ourselves? Are we not to guard against the one as well as the other? Are we to recel our militia from the frontiers? It is said that there is no danger on the sea-coast from the Algerines, and therefore we have no occasion for ships of war. But if we lay down our muskets, are we in no danger from the Indians? A member has just now stated, that an English ship of war had behaved at Norfolk with the greatest insolence. This shows how improper it is to be exposed. If we cannot defend our commerce, give it up. Why should people try to walk who cannot stand? The objectors against the argument are penny-wise and pound-foolish. He thought it a sorry compliment to the good sense of the United States, of the Congress, and the Legislature, to say, that if we build six ships this year, we must never stop till we build one or two hundred.

Mr. T. complained of the perpetual allusions, in the business of the House, to the banking and funding systems. Gentlemen should have his very humble thanks, if they would argue the question on its own grounds. He had for some time doubted whether it might not be for the advantage of Government to tell people, at once, to defend themselves, as they could expect no protection from this country. Upon the whole, Mr. T. was of opinion, that this country was so circumstanced as to require the people to arm themselves; unless gentlemen would propose some other or better remedy for repelling the injuries we sustain.

Mr. FITZSIMONS defended the report of the committee. They had gone upon good ground in proposing a naval armament, and he mentioned facts to prove that they had not gone by their own opinions. He observed that the force of Algiers was not increased since the independence of the United States, and that therefore their present operations could not be viewed as more particularly aimed at America than formerly. They do not want our provisions or our ships; plunder alone is their object; general plunder.

Mr. MADISON said, attempts had been made to reduce the present question to a pecuniary criterion. This might be thought conclusive, if it could be done with due accuracy. The calculations which had been made could never be satisfactory. To make them so, there ought to be a full statement of the amount the armament would cost, and the expense it would save in its effect on insurance. These statements must necessarily be made up so much of conjecture, that they could not lead to a very definite result. It might be of some use, however, in preventing error, to understand the true principles and grounds on which they ought to be formed, and which were conceived to be the following:

To the expense of the fleet, as estimated by the committee, add at least the ordinary excess in the execution, in the proportion which experience in such cases suggests. Add, also, the insurance on the fleet itself, which is a fair and very important item in the expense.

On the other side of the account, separate the West India trade, which is out of the Algerine risk, from the rest of the trade; and the trade to Spain, Portugal, and the more Southern parts, which is subject to a greater, from the trade to the Northern parts of Europe, which is subject to a much less, if to any risk.

The return of exports for 1791, is—
To the West Indies - - - 6,566,489
To Spain and Portugal, &c. - - 2,454,897
To North of Europe - - - 8,550,665
$17,571,551

No return of imports being at hand for the same year, take the preceding year, for which the amount of some branches is known, and call it - - - $20,000,000

From the West Indies - - - 4,000,000
From Spain and Portugal - - - 980,878
From more Southern places - - - 1,000,000
From North of Europe - - - 15,000,000
Exports and imports to and from the West Indies - - - 10,566,489

On this, the extra insurance, on account of the Algerine risk, if there be any, ought to be calculated, as also on the value of the tonnage employed.

Exports to and from Spain and Portugal - - - $3,454,397
Deduct what will continue to go in neutral vessels. - - -
Deduct from balance the proportion of winter freights when Algerines are not out. - - -

Calculate on the final balance only the extra insurance.

Exports and imports to and from North of Europe - - - $23,545,703

Deduct the large proportion that will continue to go in neutral vessels.

Deduct from the balance the proportion of winter freights.

Calculate on the final balance only the extra insurance.

Tonnage to and from Spain and Portugal - - - 48,698 tons.

Deduct for winter voyages.

Calculate on the balance only the extra insurance on the value of the vessels.

Tonnage to and from North of Europe - - - 97,820 tons.

Deduct for winter voyages.

Calculate on the balance only the extra insurance.

From the sum of these extra insurances, deduct the proportion that will remain, notwithstanding the equipment of the fleet, and which will consequently not be saved by the expense of it.

Mr. M. replied to several of the arguments of the gentlemen who were in favor of the resolutions. He went into some minute details respecting trade and commerce; and, particularly, remarked, that there was not any security for Portugal's renewing the truce with Algiers after the present term should expire.

Mr. GOODHUE.—The gentlemen (Mr. MANISOS) last up, from Virginia, as well as most others on his side of the question, have rested their chief argument against the equipment proposed in the resolution before us, on the probability that Spain and Portugal will, after the present war in Europe is over, find themselves under the necessity of restraining the depredations of the Algerine corsairs on our trade, from the want they will always be in for the productions of this country for their subsistence. That they will be in want of the productions of this country, and that they cannot well do without them, is granted; but can we doubt it would be good policy in Great Britain to continue the Algerines in peace with Spain and Portugal, and in hostility with us, in order that their ships, instead of ours, might be the carriers of those of our articles to Spain and Portugal which are so much wanted? This would be increasing the British carrying trade at our expense indeed. Spain and Portugal would not care what ships brought these articles, so that they had a supply. It is in vain, Mr. Chairman, that we pretend to be friends to the trade and navigation of this country, while we refuse to protect it. The merchants know it is within our ability to protect it against the Algerine corsairs, and unless we attempt it, they will justly think themselves neglected. And what will their language be?—that you have spent more than a million of dollars annually, for several years, in the protection of our frontiers, and now, when commerce, the source of all our revenue, is attacked, you deny it any kind of protection. Surely this is so unjust and impolitic, that it cannot be expected they will put up with it.

Mr. HARRISON was against the report; and Mr. MURRAY protracted the debate some minutes longer, by speaking against Mr. MANISOS. At length the question was called for, when there arose in favor of the report 47, against it 45.

Mr. NEW brought in a report from the committee on the situation of the people from St. Domingo. The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 12.

An engrossed bill for extending the time for transmitting the oaths of absent owners of vessels, and for the relief of Thomas Jenkins and Sons, was read the third time and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the remission of the duties arising on the tonnage of sundry French vessels, which have taken refuge in the ports of the United States; and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be recommitted to Mr. VENABLE, Mr. TALLNOT, and Mr. LYMAN.

The House again resolved itself into a committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to report whether any, and what alterations or amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act "to establish the Post Office and Post Roads of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

THURSDAY, February 13.

A petition of Thomas Walley, William Tudor, William Payne, and John M'Lean, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House, and read, praying that an additional duty may be imposed on the importation of window glass, or such encouragement given to the manufacture of the said article within the United States, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. CORR, and Mr. HINDMAN, to whom were referred the several memorials and petitions of the manufacturers of paint, in the towns of Baltimore and Alexandria; of the dealers in oil and painters' colors; of Thomas Pearsall, and Elijah Pell; of Thomas Perkins and Company; and of Samuel Swann; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House; and that Mr. DEXTER, Mr. GILES, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. PAGE, be added to the said committee.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to report whether any, and what alterations or amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act "to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. HEATH, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the memorial of Winthrop Sargent, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Standing Committee of Elections, in the case of the petition of Henry Latimer, complaining of an undue election and return of JOHN PATTON, the member returned to serve in this House for the State of Delaware, being called for, Resolved, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from proceeding thereon, and that the hearing on the trial of the said contested election be now proceeded on in the House.

Ordered, That the petitioner, on his prayer, be admitted to the bar of the House, to be heard in support of the allegations of his petition. The House then proceeded to the hearing on the trial of the said contested election; and the depositions and other exhibits being partly read, as also, the observations in writing of the sitting member thereupon, an adjournment was called for; whereupon,

Ordered, That all further proceedings on the said hearing be adjourned until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, February 14.

A petition of M'Cullen, MacGregor, and Company, of Albany, in the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that an additional duty may be imposed on the importation of glass, or such encouragement given to the manufacture of the said article within the United States, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. CORR, Mr. HINDMAN, Mr. DEXTER, Mr. GILES, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. PAGE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

DELAWARE CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the hearing on the trial of the contested election in the case of the petition of HENRY LATIMER, complaining of an undue election and return of JOHN PATTON, the member returned to serve in this House for the State of Delaware; and the depositions and other exhibits in the said case being fully read, the parties retired from the bar.

The House then proceeded to a decision on the said contested election; and, after debate thereon, A motion was made and seconded that the House do agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That JOHN PATTON is not entitled to a seat in this House.

which was resolved in the affirmative.

Another motion being then made and seconded, that the House do agree to the following resolution:

Resolved, That HENRY LATIMER is entitled to a seat in this House, as the Representative of the State of Delaware.

Mr. PAGE said:—I confess I doubt whether the sixty-eight freemen of Sussex ought to be deprived of the votes which they gave, merely because they did not vote for two persons instead of one; for I think the law, which must have been intended to secure their rights as electors, could not deprive them of their suffrage. The Constitution of the United States, it is true, gives the State Legislatures a right to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections; but I cannot prevail on myself to think that the words, "the manner of holding elections," ought to be construed to extend to the words of the election law of the State of Delaware, so as to render the conduct of the sixty-eight freemen of Sussex a violation of that law; or, if it be a violation thereof, that the violation is of such a nature as to deprive them of a right which no law can abrogate; a right which should be held as sacred, and which it cannot become this House to diminish in the smallest degree. Thinking thus, sir, I doubted of the propriety of the vote which the House has given on the first question before it, viz: "that the sitting member is not entitled to a seat in this House." Entertaining this doubt, I can have none respecting the question now before us, viz: "Is the petitioner entitled to a seat?"—for I cannot construe the Constitution of the United States, or the law of Delaware, so rigidly, as to think that we should call illegal the sixty-eight votes given in Sussex County; by which construction alone the House has declared Mr. PATTON not entitled to a seat—which alone the petitioner, Mr. LATIMER, can found his claim. Had there been any violation of the law, of such a nature as tended to introduce corrupt elections, or to diminish the right of free suffrages, I should, with pleasure, give my voice to disgrace and render null any such conduct in future. But here is merely an act of freemen, perfectly compatible with their immutable, inalienable privileges; not inconsistent with the law of their State, but merely falling short of a provision in a law, calculated, it is said, to secure to them the full benefit of that inestimable privilege. I cannot, therefore, think, sir, that on such slight grounds, we ought to reject a member, elected by the freemen of Delaware, and duly returned; but should go on, and admit to a seat in this House a person not returned, and if returned, not having a majority of votes. In the case of the Georgia election, I voted for the reception of the petitioner, because he incontestably proved (to my satisfaction at least) that he had a majority of legal votes, and that the sitting member had been returned by means of corruption, which the State endeavored to chastize and stigmatize. The Executive of that State showed an anxiety to support the claim of the petitioner. In the present case, there is no corruption proved or insinuated; no interference of the State; and a legal return, which, I suppose, was founded on such construction as I have put on the Constitution of the United States and the law of Delaware. The House, in the case of the Georgia election, differed from my opinion, and established (as some gentlemen called it) a precedent, which would keep the House clear from suspicions of partiality, and which I wish now to be observed. I acknowledge, excluding a member may be attended with inconvenience, but a double inconvenience may arise by depriving the citizens of a Representative—the man of their choice—and, at the same time, forcing on them one for whom a majority did not vote. For these reasons I shall vote against the resolutions.

The question was then resolved in the affirmative—yeas 57, nays 31, as follows:

Whereupon, the said HENRY LATIMER took his seat in the House, as the member for the State of Delaware; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to him by Mr. SPEAKER, according to law.

MONDAY, February 17.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the committee to whom were referred the memorials of the people called Quakers, at their yearly meeting, held in Rhode Island, in the year, 1793; of the delegates from the several Societies for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, in convention assembled at Philadelphia, on the first day of January last; and of the Providence Society for abolishing the Slave Trade; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to prohibit the fitting out of any ship or vessel in any port of the United States, either by citizens of the United States or foreigners, for the purpose of procuring from any kingdom or country the inhabitants of such kingdom or country, to be transported to any foreign parts or places of the world, to be sold or disposed of as slaves.

Ordered, That Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. WARD, Mr. GILES, Mr. TALBOT, and Mr. GROV, be a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Ordered, That the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Arthur St. Clair, which was made on the first day of March last, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

POST OFFICE BILL.

The Post Office business was then taken up, in Committee of the Whole. A vast number of new post roads were ordered, without opposition. The Committee then came to the consideration of that part of the report which relates to newspapers, and it was moved, that the postage of them should be reduced to half a cent to distances not exceeding one hundred miles, and one cent for any greater distance. This was advocated on the ground, that newspapers from the Seat of Government, and the

Mr. PICKENS, from the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, of the 13th ult., transmitting the copy of a Letter from Constant Freeman, Agent for the War Department in Georgia, to the Secretary of War, dated the first of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, with sundry enclosures relative to the Creek Indians, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the copy of a Letter which I have received from the Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and, at their desire, the representation mentioned in the said Letter, pointing out certain defects in the Judiciary system.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 19, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to report whether any, and what, alterations and amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act "to establish the Post Office and Post Roads of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and made several amendments thereto, which were severally read twice, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said report, and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. TRACY, Mr. GLENN, Mr. CLARK, Mr. FITZGERMONS, Mr. DENT, Mr. WALKER, Mr. McDOWELL, Mr. HUNTER, and Mr. DEARBORN, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES of the 30th ultimo, enclosing the copy of a Letter from the Governor of North Carolina, covering a resolution of the Legislature of that State; as also, the petitions of Thomas Person and others, proprietors of lands in the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, and of the Trustees of the University of North Carolina, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to take into consideration the act "to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," and report some provision in the case where any Judge of the Courts of the United States is, or may, by sickness, or other disqualifying cause, be rendered incapable of discharging the duties of his office; also, some further provision concerning bail, process, and costs, in the Courts of the United States; and, generally, to report such amendments to said act as they may judge necessary and Constitutional; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

stitutional; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said report under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the act "to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," as is, or may be, construed to require the attendance of the Marshal of each State, at each of the sessions of the Supreme Court, shall be repealed; and that, in future, the said Court shall be attended during session by the Marshal of the district in which they sit, unless by special order the Court shall require the same.

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, Mr. MOORE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. THATCHER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CHRISTIE.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Andrew G. Fraunces: Whereupon, Resolved, That the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Treasury for refusing payment of the warrants referred to in the memorial, are fully sufficient to justify his conduct; and that, in the whole course of this transaction, the Secretary and other officers of the Treasury have acted a meritorious part towards the public.

Resolved, That the charge exhibited in the memorial against the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to the purchase of the pension of Baron de Glaubeck, is wholly illiberal and groundless.

THURSDAY, February 20.

The House, according to the standing order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the state of the Union under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table.

Ordered, That the said resolutions do lie on the table.

FRIDAY, February 21.

A petition of Josiah G. Pierson, of the City of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying that such further and additional restrictions may be laid on the importation of nails from foreign countries as may be deemed expedient to encourage the manufacture of the said article within the United States.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. COIT, Mr. HINDMAN, Mr. DEITER, Mr. GILES, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. PAGE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, communicating an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States, declaring the claims of certain invalid pensioners under the act, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans barred by the limitation, heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions," not to be valid; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

NAVAL ARMAMENT.

The House proceeded to consider the resolutions reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Whereupon, The question being taken on the first resolution, in the words following to wit:

"Resolved, That a Naval force, to consist of four ships of forty four, and two ships of twenty guns each, be provided for the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruizers."

It was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 43, nays 41, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Cost, Jonathan Dayton, George Dent, Samuel Dexter, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Wilkes Kittera, Henry Latimer, Richard Bland Lee, Francis Malbone, William Vans Murray, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, Samuel Smith, William Smith, Thomas Sprigg, Zephaniah Swift, Silas Talbot, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Artemas Ward, John Watts, and Richard Winn.

NAYS.—Theodorus Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Isaac Coles, William J. Dawson, Henry Dearborn, William Findley, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, Nicholas Gilman, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, William Barry Grove, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, John Hunter, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Melbaue, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Joseph Neville, Anthony New, Nathaniel Niles, John Page, Andrew Pickens, Francis Preston, Robert Rutherford, John S. Sherburne, John Smilie, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, Paine Wingate, and Joseph Winston.

The second resolution being taken up, in the words following:

"Resolved, That, for the purpose of defraying the cost of a Naval armament, and the annual expense thereof, after the — day of —, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, upon all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on which a duty of seven and a half per cent. is now payable an additional duty of one per cent."

Mr. DAYTON said, that, as on a former day, he had pledged himself to the House, to offer an amendment to the above resolution, he was now prepared to do it, and should take up very little of the time of the Committee in general prefatory remarks.

No member present, he said, could be ignorant that the articles falling under the description of those subjected to a duty of seven and a half per cent, were for the most part purchased and used by the poorer classes of the people, who were less able to bear additional burdens than any other. That indeed very many of those articles, and some of the most important of them were real necessities, and could not be furnished in this country, but must be brought from abroad, for a long time at least to come; among which he particularly mentioned coarse woollens, &c.

That, under this impression, he took the liberty to move, that instead of laying one per cent. additional duty, as the Select Committee had reported, on those articles, it might be reduced to one half per cent. only.

Mr. D. said, he was aware that the reduction of one half, as proposed by him, would occasion a diminution in the sum to be raised of about 75,000 dollars, under that head of revenue, but that the Committee of the Whole might see and understand his whole plan and object, before they decided upon a part, he would in his place, read to remedy that deficiency.

Here Mr. D. read a variety of specific articles, which, he said, were either luxuries of life, and consequently consumed or used by those who were most able to pay the duties, or articles which our own artists or manufacturers could supply in sufficient quantity, especially if this small additional protection could be held out to them.

The principal of them were as follows, viz:

On boots, an additional duty of twenty-five cents per pair.

On shoes and slippers for men and women, and on clogs and golo-shoes, five cents per pair.

On shoes and slippers for children, three cents per pair.

On millinery ready made, and artificial flowers, feathers, and other ornaments, for women's head dresses, dolls, dressed and undressed, toys, five per cent. ad valorem.

On cast, slit, and rolled iron, and generally all manufactures of iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or of which either of these metals is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated (brass and iron wire, locks, hinges, hoes, anvils, and vices excepted,) cabinet wares, carpets, and carpeting; two per cent. ad valorem.

On leather tanned and tawed, and generally all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, not otherwise particularly enumerated; two per cent. ad valorem.

On medicinal drugs, except those commonly used in dyeing, mats and floor cloths, hats, caps, and bonnets of every sort for women, gloves, mittens, stockings, fans, buttons of every kind, buckles, shoe and knee, sheathing and cartridge paper, all powders, pastes, balls, balms, ointments, oils, waters, washes, tinctures, essences, or other preparations or compositions, commonly called sweet scents, odours, perfumes, or cosmetics, and all dentifrices, powders or preparations for the teeth or gums; two per cent. ad valorem.

On gold, silver, and plated wares, gold and silver lace, jewelry, and paste work, clocks and watches, and the following groceries, viz: cinnamon, cloves, mace, nutmegs, ginger, anniseed, currants, dates, figs, plums, prunes, raisins, sugar candy, oranges, lemons, limes, and generally all fruits, and comfits, olives, capers, pickles of every sort, oil, and mustard in flour; two per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of cotton, of which cotton is the chief material, printed, stained, or colored; one and a half per cent. ad valorem.

On all marble, alate, and other stone, on bricks, tiles, tables, mortars, and other utensils of marble, or stone, and generally upon all stone and earthenware, an additional duty of five per cent.

On ships or vessels of the United States employed in foreign trade, six cents per ton; on all other ships and vessels, twenty-five cents per ton.

The additional duties which he had proposed on the articles he had thus particularly enumerated, would amount to about 75,000 dollars, which would be the diminution occasioned by the reduction of a half per cent. agreeably to this motion.

Mr. D. said, that he hoped every member, whether he favored or opposed a Naval armament to protect our commerce and our coast and harbors, would aid him and his endeavors to render the ways and means for raising the moneys as little burdensome and as unexceptionable as possible.

If the resolution for building and equipping the five frigates should ultimately be negatived, it by no means followed that the time spent in the discussion and amendment of the resolution immediately under consideration, would be uselessly spent. In any future call for money, the ways and means which should be on this occasion preferred, would probably be resorted to, and it was therefore of importance, that all should unite their exertions to make the measure as unobjectionable as possible.

So far as the encouragement of our own manufactures could be made to consist with the increase of revenue, it was certainly desirable to effect it; and it was with a view to both those important objects, that he had selected the articles which he enumerated. It was to be remembered, Mr. D. added, that it was not now a question whether they should raise more money, (this had already been determined,) but whether the increase of duties should fall upon articles of luxury, and such other articles as the United States were capable of supplying within themselves, independently of foreign countries.

After considerable discussion, which turned principally upon the propriety of affording the protection and encouragement which was contemplated in the amendment in favor of the iron and of the iron manufactures of the United States, it was moved and carried, that locks, hinges, and two or three other articles (which it was said, could not be manufactured in this country,) should be excepted.

The propositions of Mr. DAYTON were then agreed to, and were adopted as part of the report of the Committee.

The remaining resolutions were then adopted, as follows:

"Resolved, That the like drawbacks and allowances be made of the said additional duties as are now made of other duties upon goods exported from the United States.

"Resolved, That a separate account of the said duties be kept.

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to receive on loan, a sum not exceeding — dollars, to be applied towards the building and equipping of the said Naval armament, at an interest not exceeding — per cent. per annum; and that the said loan be open to any individual or body politic or corporate within the United States.

"Resolved, That the revenues herein before recited be pledged for the payment of the interest on the loan aforesaid, for the annual expense of the said armament; and that the surplus of such revenue be applied to the repayment of the principal, and to no other purpose whatever."

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. FRIZZMORS, Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. BOUDINOT, Mr. PARKER, Mr. MACON, Mr. WINN, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. WATTS, Mr. ORR, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. LATIMER, and Mr. DAYTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to report whether any, and what, sum may be necessary to be loaned for the purpose of carrying on the public service for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. GILES, and Mr. DEANBORN.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making appropriations for support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, February 24.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, was read the third time and passed.

The following Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The extracts which I now lay before you, from a Letter of our Minister at London, are supplementary to some of my past communications, and will appear to be of a confidential nature.

I also transmit to you copies of a Letter from the Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty, and the answers thereto, upon the subject of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain; together with the copy of a Letter from Messieurs Carmichael and Short, relative to our affairs with Spain; which Letter is connected with a former confidential Message.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GILES called up his resolution, laid on the table in the early part of the session, which resolution is in the following words:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine the state of the Treasury Department, and that they be instructed to report to the House, generally, thereon; and, among other things, more particularly: "1st. Whether the form of keeping the accounts be calculated to effectuate the disposition of the public moneys, as prescribed by law.

"2d. Whether the cash receipts, from the domestic resources, have exceeded, or fallen short of the Government to the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; remarking the dates and amount of any excess, or deficiency, quarterly.

"3d. Whether the Sinking Fund, at the time of its establishment, consisted of cash or bonds; specifying, in the latter case, as nearly as may be, the several dates at which any sum or sums of such bonds became payable.

"4th. What proceedings have been made under the laws of the fourth and twelfth of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, authorizing loans of money, and what authorities were given for those proceedings. That they also state, in dollars and cents, the gross principal of debt in Holland, produced to the United States by the said loans, and the precise amount of the principal of the foreign debt, which has been discharged thereby: what portion of such loans has been drawn to the United States, at what dates, and by what authority; in what manner such drafts have been applied; under what forms and checks those drafts were made; and whether the moneys raised thereby were immediately deposited in the Treasury; if not, in what places, and to what amount, were such moneys deposited; how much time elapsed after such loans, before the said moneys came into the Treasury; whether a complete fulfilment of our engagements to France was, in any degree, obviated by such drafts; whether any portion of the French debt remained unpaid, at the end of one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two; and whether any balance of the said debt is yet unpaid. And that the Committee do also report the date of the first information to this House, communicating the said drafts; and whether any call of the House was made upon the Treasury Department, which embraced the idea of a previous disclosure thereof.

"5th. That the committee be also instructed to report the whole amount of the existing debt of the United States, discriminating the domestic from the foreign debt, and specifying the amount of domestic debt bearing a present interest of six per centum; the amount bearing a present interest of three per centum, and the amount deferred. That they also report the increase or decrease of the whole debt of the United States, and the operation of the Sinking Fund, to the end of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three."

Mr. GILES observed, that very shortly after the meeting of Congress, he had laid this resolution on the table, under a conviction of the propriety of the measure, and the hope of a speedy decision upon it. An occurrence took place a few days afterwards, which produced a temporary delay. An individual presented a memorial to Congress, containing some suggestions against the official conduct of the gentleman at the head of the Department; and to have pressed the inquiry into the general state of the Treasury, during the pendency of those suggestions, might have been deemed a violation of delicacy and propriety. Very soon after the imputations from that source were done away by report of a committee, he had called up the resolution, but the House, acting under the impressions produced by the delicate crisis of our external affairs, refused to enter into the consideration of the subject at that time.

Mr. G. remarked, that while on the one hand he was desirous of looking into a subject which he deemed important to the public welfare, as well as to gratify an officer in a request which he conceived had been impelled by the delicacy of his situation, he was not unwilling, on the other hand, to yield to the opinion of the House, which induced an immediate attention to our affairs with foreign nations. The subjects of commercial regulations, and the naval armament, being now out of the view of the House, at least for some days, he hoped the chasm would be filled by the consideration of the resolution he had proposed. He could not help remarking, that at an early period of the session this resolution had been termed the torch of discord. He thought if it could be viewed with impartiality, and according to its own design, it would not be found to possess that character. The primary object of the resolution is, to ascertain the boundaries of discretion and authority between the Legislature and the Treasury Department. To effect this object, it becomes necessary to have a knowledge of the state of the Treasury Department. This appeared to him an obvious duty of the House of Representatives, operating equally upon every individual of whom it is composed; it therefore seemed strange to him, that an attempt to discharge an essential duty should be construed into a design to interrupt the harmony of deliberation.

If to require a full and comprehensive view of the public finances, and the modes in which they are contributed and distributed, be construed into an effort at discord, it must arise either from the opinion that Congress already possess this view, or from the principle that they ought not to possess it, but that the whole knowledge of this subject should be left to the Treasury officers. If this doctrine be contended for, he thought it ought to stimulate the exertions of those who believed it to be subversive of the primary principle of the Constitution. He requested the House to accompany him in making a few reflections upon this subject.

The Debt of the United States forms an important item of legislation. Its system is intricate, its extent unknown; it embraces the interests of a very sagacious and powerful class of citizens. It is made, by the Constitution, the peculiar province of the Representatives, immediately chosen by the people, to superintend the contributions and the distributions of all public moneys. This may be deemed the highest duty of the Representatives. It may be asked—How this most important of duties can be understandingly performed, but by a knowledge of the whole machinery of the Treasury Department? There can be no prospect of acting wisely, where there are no means of judging rightly. The omission to discharge this important Legislative function, by the Representatives, will necessarily cause it to be performed by the Head of the Department. A species of laws will grow out of an inattention to, and a consequent ignorance of, this subject, which may be called the rules of office, the forms of the Treasury, the practical constructions of laws contravening the legal constructions. In all conflicts between this species of laws and the laws pronounced by the Constitutional tribunal, the advantage would be in favor of the Treasury system: because this would be the practical, that the theoretic system of legislation. An inattention to this subject, which is an intricate and complicated one, and a consequent ignorance of it might, in a course of time, leave to the Legislature the mere right of registering Treasury edicts. It may be said, that this is not the case at present. It is not proposed to give any opinion on this point. The remarks have been intended to show the probable tendency of intrusting this important branch of legislation to the Treasury Department; which would be the infallible consequence of the ignorance of the Legislature of the Treasury proceedings. The propriety of placing confidence in the Executive officers, is an argument very familiar to this House. To a certain extent, it is in every respect proper. It is proper, so long as the officer confines himself to his legal designated functions. If in any case he should exceed these, it becomes the duty of the Legislature to notice the proceeding. It is also the duty of the Legislature to ascertain his functions by law, and to limit his discretion. This argument of confidence in the Executive officers may easily be carried to a dangerous excess. The people have confidence in their Representatives; they bestow on them certain trusts, and impose on them certain duties. The Representatives have confidence in the Executive officers; they transfer to them these trusts and these duties. What would be the result? A complete and radical change in the most essential character of the Government. Instead of the Legislature prescribing rules of conduct to the people, the Executive officers would prescribe them; and the Legislature would be of no other use than to legalize Executive proceedings. This would be a desertion of the trust reposed in the Representatives. The consideration of individual case, would always operate in favor of this idea. The argument of individual interest might possibly aid it in some instances, and the argument of policy in others; for there may be some individuals who might possibly prefer that to the Constitutional state of things. These remarks had been made to show, in very general terms, the impressions which the subject had made on his mind; to exhibit its general object; to prove that it was not unimportant; and that, if such should be the opinion of the House, the stage of the session required that it should receive immediate attention.

Mr. PAGE said, that he looked upon those resolutions as the only proper objects of the proposed committee; as being those on which the chief view of the author of them was fixed; and which, too, came up exactly to the ideas of the Secretary himself, as expressed in his Letter, calling on the House for an inquiry into his conduct. He was surprised to hear gentlemen talk of exciting suspicions, by setting on foot such an inquiry: for his part, were he the Secretary, he should never rest till his requisition of an inquiry had been fully complied with. That an inquiry into the conduct of the Treasurer ought to be made, (as it was annually in the State from which he came, where a committee of both Houses not only examined the Treasurer's accounts, but corrected and weighed his money,) notwithstanding his honesty and virtue; and that this examination had been found useful and necessary, for deficiencies had been discovered; and in one instance by the Treasurer himself, (although it had escaped the Committee,) who honestly informed the Assembly of it, and only asked time to replace the deficient money, which he did. As to the impriety of revising the proceedings of the House of Representatives in their last session, he thought nothing of it—not as much as he should of repealing one of its laws; and surely as it could not be denied that this House had a right to examine any proceedings of the last, which had received the sanction of the Senate and President too, it must be very extraordinary to doubt its right to revise the proceedings of the House of Representatives alone, and more so when that revision has been requested, even by the Secretary of the Treasury, the person who was the particular object of those proceedings.

Ordered, That Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. HUNTER, Mr. McDOWELL, Mr. GILES, Mr. GREENUP, Mr. DENT, Mr. LATIMER, Mr. IRVINE, Mr. BEATTY, Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, Mr. NILES, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. COFFIN, and Mr. WINGATE, be a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

TUESDAY, February 25.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill providing for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in alteration of the act for establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The said bill was then read the third time and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Arthur St. Clair; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, February 26.

A petition and representation of the pilots of Ocracoke bar, in the State of North Carolina, masters of vessels, and merchants, owners of vessels, trading in and out at the same, was presented to the House and read, suggesting various reasons against the erection of a light-house on Ocracoke Island, and praying that the same may be erected on Shell-Castle Island, in the harbor of Ocracoke.

Ordered, That the said petition and representation be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

Resolved, That the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the Treasury Department, have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to consider and report on the propriety of remitting the duty on imported bar iron, in certain cases; and Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. FITZSIMONS, and Mr. SEDGWICK, be the said committee.

Resolved, That so much of the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as respects arms and military stores, magazines, and arsenals, together with the return of arms and military stores, reported by the Secretary for the Department of War, be referred to a special committee, and that they report whether any, or what, addition ought to be made to any or all of these objects; with an estimate of the expense of any augmentation they may recommend.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. FORREST, Mr. MASON, Mr. BODINOR, Mr. PANDER, Mr. MACON, Mr. WINK, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. WATTS, Mr. ORR, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. LATIMER, and Mr. DAYTON, be a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the relief of Lucy Clark; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

On a motion made and seconded, that the said bill be recommitted to a select committee, it passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy, imposed by the House in the case of the Letter from the Secretary of State to the British Minister, and the answer thereto, communicated by Message from the President on Monday last, be removed, and that the said letters be considered as public.

THURSDAY, February 27.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed to report whether any, and what, sum may be necessary to be loaned for the purpose of carrying on the public service for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of War, on the petition of William M'Hutton; and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Report under consideration, but came to no resolution thereupon.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the farther consideration of the said Report; and that Mr. BODINOR, Mr. GREENUP, and Mr. BAILEY, be a committee to report whether any, and what, alterations or amendments are in their opinion necessary to the act "to regulate the claims to Invalid Pensions."

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for the payment of the interest on the balances credited certain States, in the books of the Treasury, upon the final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States."

"Resolved, That the balances due from sundry of the States, on the final settlement of the accounts between the individual States and the United States, ought to be paid in — years, by annual instalments."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the remission of certain duties; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

And on the question that the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time, it passed in the negative. And so the said bill was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the motion of the 19th instant, "for the repeal of so much of the act 'to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,' as is or may be construed to require the attendance of the Marshal of each State, at each of the sessions of the Supreme Court, and providing that, in future, the said Court shall be attended during session by the Marshal of the District in which they sit, unless by special order the Court shall require the same," made a report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That it will be proper to pass a law repealing so much of the act 'to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,' as is or may be construed to require the attendance of the Marshals of all the Districts at the Supreme Court, and enacting that the said Court shall be attended, during its session, by the Marshal of the District only in which the Court shall sit, unless the attendance of the Marshals of other Districts shall be required by special order of the Court.

The House then proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House, on the nineteenth instant, to the report of the committee appointed to take into consideration the act "to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," and report some provision in the case where any Judge of the Courts of the United States is, or may, by sickness, or other disqualifying cause, be rendered incapable of discharging the duties of his office; also, some further provision concerning bail, process, and costs, in the Courts of the United States; and, generally, to report such amendments to the said act as they may judge necessary and Constitutional; and the said amendments being severally twice read, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said report as amended, and to the preceding resolution, and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, Mr. MOORE, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. THATCHER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. CHRISTIE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That there be a call of the House to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Henry Hill. Whereupon, Ordered, That the said report be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant Colonel Tonsard. Whereupon,

Resolved, That there be allowed to the said Lieutenant Colonel Tonsard an equivalent for his pension for life, agreeably to the rule of commutation, as adopted by the United States, in lieu of the half pay to the officers of the late Army.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. LEARNED, do prepare and bring in the same.

FRIDAY, February 28.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed to prepare and report to the House an estimate of the expense that will be requisite to place the principal seaports and harbors of the United States in a state of defence, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report such standing Rules and Orders of proceeding as may be proper to be observed in this House; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

ON THE STATE OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. SEDGWICK called up a report of a select committee to whom it had been referred, to report whether any, and what, sum was necessary to be borrowed for the service of the current year. The report states it to be expedient that the President should be authorized to borrow $1,000,000, if in his opinion the same shall be necessary. The report was referred to a Committee of the Whole, and the House resolved itself into a Committee accordingly.

The report being read, Mr. SEDGWICK said it was the duty of the select committee to state the several steps which had been taken in the progress of their inquiry, and the facts which had come to their knowledge during the investigation, that the result which was expressed in their report might have its merits decided on by the Committee of the Whole.

He stated that, however inadequate the actual receipts of the revenue might be to discharge all the demands made on the Government, there was in fact no deficiency in the funds appropriated to the discharge of those demands. The deficit was owing merely to the credit which, for the convenience and benefit of trade, was allowed to the merchants; and that, in fact, the bonded duties were more than equal to meet all the demands on the Treasury. This credit, it would be remembered, extended from four months to two years.

He next stated that, by the report now in the possession of the Committee, that the deficiency at the end of the present quarter would amount to $621,294 18. The select committee were not fully acquainted with the Bank transactions in relation to the Treasury, and were uncertain whether money deposited in Banks by Collectors of revenue was considered as in the Treasury from the time of the deposit. He observed, that this doubt arose from considering the law constituting the Treasury Department, by which it appeared that the Secretary's warrant was as well required for paying money in, as for issuing it from the Treasury. It might therefore happen, if the deposit money was not considered as in the Treasury, that the apparent deficit reported, of $621,294 18, might exist, while, in fact, there might be at the disposal of Government a sufficient sum completely to answer every demand.

Mr. S. said that, contemplating the subject in this view, the select committee had thought it their duty to submit certain questions to the Secretary, which they had accordingly done; the import of which was, "whether money collected on account of the United States, in Banks, was from the time of deposit considered as in the Treasury? Or, are any, and if any what, means necessary to subject money so deposited to the control of the Treasurer? And in the latter case who is, from the time of such deposit until it passes into the Treasury, responsible to the United States? Is any money now so deposited capable of being drawn into the Treasury? And, if any, is the probable amount such as to render a present provision for a loan inexpedient or unnecessary?"

Mr. S. then read the following Letter, addressed to him as Chairman of the select committee, from the Secretary of the Treasury:

THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 25, 1794.

SIR: The following are answers to the questions stated in your Letter of the 22d instant, viz.:

Answer to question the first.

"All moneys collected on account of the United States, and deposited in the Bank to the credit of the Treasurer, are considered as in the Treasury from the time of the deposit. The steady course with regard to the standing revenue is, that the money deposited in the Bank passes immediately to the credit of the Treasurer. But it is necessary, to discharge the payers, that receipts of the Treasurer should be endorsed upon warrants signed by the Secretary, countersigned by the Comptroller, and registered by the Register, which is the course regularly observed.

Answer to question the second.

"After moneys are deposited in Banks to the credit of the Treasurer, they are in his control, though they may not legally be disbursed but upon warrants of the above description. If deposited without passing in the first instance to the credit of the Treasurer, the means used for placing them in his custody and disposal are warrants of the like kind.

Answer to question the third.

"In respect to any moneys of the United States, deposited in Banks, but not passed to the credit of the Treasurer, the Banks are considered as directly responsible to the United States; in the case of deposits to the credit of the Treasurer, they are responsible, in the first instance to him, ultimately to the United States.

Answer to question the fourth.

"Only two cases are recollected, in which moneys of the United States may be considered as having been deposited in Bank without passing, in the first instance, into the account of the Treasurer. These relate, first, to the proceeds of foreign bills sold for the Government and received by the Bank, (all accounts of which are now finally closed;) second, to the sum of $200,000, being the only sum now so deposited, which arises from the last loan had of the Bank. It is left (subject to the eventual decision of the Legislature) as an offset against the second instalment of the two million loan from the Bank.

"The effect of the operation will be this: An interest of six per cent, payable to the Bank upon the instalment, will be extinguished from the 31st December last, by an interest of five per cent, payable to the Bank upon the sum borrowed of itself and left in deposit. And it has been endeavored thereby, to preserve consistency and regularity in the arrangements of the Treasury. The first instalment, by leaving in deposit an equal sum of the proceeds of foreign bills, was considered as effected on the 31st December, 1792, though there was not power to consummate the payment till some months after. Hence, it becomes regular, that each succeeding instalment should be paid on the last of December of each year. The provisional measure, thus adopted, was the only expedient in the power of the Treasury to reconcile, as far as practicable, considerations relative to the public interest and credit, with legality of procedure. Neither the sum in deposit, on the one hand, nor the instalment payable to the Bank, on the other, is brought into the probable state of cash lately presented to the House of Representatives; because they balance each other and leave the result the same.

"There are no existing sources from which moneys can come into the Bank on account of the United States, except from the proceeds of the revenue, which, as far as known, are comprised in the statement before the House of Representatives. So that there is no resource but a loan which can supply the deficit of receipt in the course of the present and succeeding quarters, compared with the expenditure; without one, a failure in the public payments is inevitable.

"If what has been said should not give the Committee the light they desire, it is imagined that personal explanations would lead more fully to their object than the course of written interrogatories and answers, which can only partially embrace the subject, and may procrastinate a right understanding of it.

"I am, sir, with esteem and regard, &c.

"ALEX. HAMILTON.

"THEODORE SEDGWICK, Esq.,

"Chairman of the Committee."

After reading this Letter, Mr. S. observed, that the business as transacted, in the manner stated in the Secretary's Letter, was the most beneficial possible for the United States, because it prevented any money, at any time collected for the public, lying beyond the reach of the Government and useless. He further observed, that gentlemen would remember that it was necessary, not only to provide for a deficiency which might exist at the end of the current quarter, but also for that next succeeding. That, to enable the select committee to discharge the duty which they owed to the House in this respect, it had been thought expedient to call on the Secretary. This they had accordingly done; and had extended their inquiry to that period to fulfil the object of their commission. That the estimate resulting in their report was formed of the best materials they could collect. He said that, in several particulars, it was probable that the estimate might not be justified by events. It ought, however, to be remembered, that it was the duty of the Legislature to put the preservation of the public credit almost beyond the reach of the possibility of being injured.

The first article, he mentioned, was the deficit which would exist on the first of April, amounting, as clearly reported to the House, to $621,294 18—1,000,000 florins were to be paid in Holland by the first of July. The committee had agreed to estimate this at $400,000, though, according to the present rate of exchange, it would amount to about $40,000 more. Gentlemen would undoubtedly perceive that it was for the public interest that this object should be provided for as early as possible, that advantage might be taken of the occurring circumstances, so as to conduct the business most profitably for the United States. One quarter of the interest of the Public Debt was $700,000; one quarter of the Civil List was estimated at $50,000. This he said would amount to somewhat more, owing to the increase of the number of the members of the Legislature. The remaining item mentioned by him was the Army expenditures, estimated at $375,000. This item, he observed, might vary more from the estimate than any of the preceding. It might rise considerably above it, it might fall considerably below. The conjecture would, however, be found probably not far from the truth. The aggregate of these several items amounted to $2,146,294 18. To satisfy this sum, it appeared, by returns in the Secretary's office, that there would fall due of duties on imports and tonnage, in the months of April, May, and June, and of course in season to meet the demands which may be made on the first of July, $448,802 22. There will also be received, in the same period, one quarter of the annual duties on distilled spirits, amounting by estimate to $100,000; which, added to the returned amount of the duties as before stated, of $448,802 22, makes an aggregate of $548,802 22. This sum, deducted from the aggregate of the estimated demands which may become necessary to be discharged, being as before stated $2,146,294 18, would leave a balance to be provided for by loan of $1,597,491 96.

He observed, however, that there were two considerations which would considerably lessen this balance. These were, first, that there was a deficiency of returns of bonded duties; and, second, the revenue of the present year, arising from imports and tonnage, which would be in fact received previous to the first day of July. These two articles the Secretary had estimated at $600,000; this he had founded on his experience on this subject. The committee had thought their report might result in round numbers, departing somewhat from the Secretary's estimate, by reducing the $600,000 to $597,491 96, leaving, according to their report, a balance of $1,000,000 to be provided for by loan.

Mr. S. said, it was true that all the demands on the Treasury might not be made at the precise moment they became due. It was, indeed, probable that the money due to foreign officers in particular might not; but he repeated that it was the duty of the Legislature to put the public credit beyond the reach of injury; and that, by the report of the select committee, the authority to borrow was only to exist in the case of necessity.

Mr. Gules said, the Chairman of the select committee had made a fair and comprehensive statement of the conduct of the committee, as far as he had gone; there were, however, some facts which he had omitted, that he thought should be communicated. He said that in the course of the committee's investigation, it had appeared that the contract contemplated by the act for incorporating the Bank, had been dated either in June or July. It had, however, been agreed that it should have a retrospective effect, so as to interest the United States in the Bank from the commencement of its operations. He thought it also his duty to state to the committee, though not in opposition to the report, that it had been made a question whether the payment of the instalments due to the Bank from the United States should be considered as falling due at the time of the commencement of its operations, or at the time of executing the contract. That this question had been referred to the Attorney General, who had given an opinion in favor of the latter period. That the Secretary, notwithstanding, had, in opposition to this opinion, made the first payment in December, very near the time when the Bank commenced its operations, instead of June or July when the contract was executed. Mr. G. said he merely stated these facts, believing the committee should be acquainted with them.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, the facts mentioned by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GULES] had appeared during the investigation of the committee, and were truly stated. That he himself should have any influence in determining the question under consideration. That, when this question was decided, he would bring forward a motion by which the House should be officially possessed of a knowledge of those facts. At present, he would only observe to the committee, that it was true the contract between the Secretary and the Bank, in pursuance of the legal provision, was executed in June or July; that it was, by the contract, agreed that it should have a retrospective operation to the time of the commencement of the negotiations of the Bank. It ought, however, to be noticed, that by this means the United States were obliged to pay an interest of six per cent. on the amount of their subscription for the time preceding the date of the contract, but they were for the same time interested in the profits of the Bank, which, amounting to considerably more than six per cent, the difference was a clear balance in favor of the public. It was also to be observed that, by paying the instalments in December, instead of June or July, a debt due from the Government, bearing an interest of six per cent., was exchanged for one bearing an interest of five per cent., so that in both the instances mentioned by the gentleman, there was a clear and manifest saving to the United States.

The report of the select committee was agreed to and adopted by the House, and Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. GULES, and Mr. DEARBORN, were directed to report a bill conformably thereto.

Mr. SEDGWICK then moved that the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish the House with a copy of the contract made in pursuance of the eleventh section of the act for incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States; also, a copy of any opinion which may have been given by the Attorney General, relative to a construction of the contract; and that he inform the House of any provisional measures which may have been taken to discharge the second instalment, due on the said loan. This motion was agreed to.

He next moved that a committee be appointed to prepare and report a bill providing for the second instalment, due on a loan made of the Bank of the United States. This motion was also agreed to, and a committee, consisting of Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. W. SMITH, and Mr. CADWALADER, accordingly appointed.

MONDAY, March 3.

A petition of the merchants, manufacturers of iron, and ship-builders, in the city of Philadelphia and its vicinity, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that so much of the impost laws of the

H. OF R.]

Amendment to the Constitution.

[MARCH, 1794.]

United States as imposes a duty on the importation of bar iron, may be repealed.
Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. FITZSIMMONS, and Mr. SEDGWICK, that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee, presented a bill authorizing a loan of one million of dollars; which was twice read, and committed.
Ordered, That the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the 7th day of January last, respecting the appointment of an officer for the receiving, safe-keeping, and distributing of public supplies, under the direction of the War Department, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States; which was twice read and committed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you an extract from a Letter of Mr. Short, relative to our affairs with Spain, and copies of two Letters from our Minister at Lisbon, with their enclosures, containing intelligence from Algiers; the whole of these communications are made in confidence, except the passage in Mr. Short's Letter which respects the Spanish convoy.

UNITED STATES, March 3, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Report was read from the Secretary of the Treasury, on sundry petitions which had been referred to him. The letter enclosing this report suggests to the House, whether it would not be expedient to place the business of reporting on petitions in some other channel, as the pressure of his official duties, in addition to the extra business of the inquiry into the Treasury Department, will not permit him to pay that seasonable and prompt attention to these petitions which the parties expect, and have just claim to.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for the payment of the second instalment due on a loan made of the Bank of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

Ordered, That the resolution agreed to by this House on the second of January last, "for appropriating a sum of money, in addition to the provision heretofore made to defray any expense which may be incurred in relation to the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations," be committed to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. AMES, and Mr. NEW, with instruction to prepare and bring in a bill or bills pursuant thereto.

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the gross sum of money which has been advanced by the United States, in making presents to the Creek and Cherokee Indians, since the treaty made at New York; also, all expenses incurred, and sums of money expended, in making the said treaty.

Ordered, That Mr. CARNES and Mr. MACON be a committee to wait on the President, with the foregoing resolution.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the 30th ultimo, enclosing a copy of a Letter from the Governor of North Carolina, covering a resolution of the Legislature of that State; as also, the petitions of Thomas Person and others, proprietors of lands in the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, and of the Trustees of the University of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the committee rose and reported progress.

TUESDAY, March 4.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill authorizing a loan of one million of dollars; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report to the House an estimate of the expense that will be requisite to place the principal seaports and harbors of the United States in a state of defence; and after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported progress.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the resolution sent from the Senate, "proposing an article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the Judicial power;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported, that the Committee had had the said resolution under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

A motion was then made, and seconded, to amend the said proposed article of amendment, at the Clerk's table, by adding to the end thereof, the words following, to wit: "Where such State shall have previously made provision in their own Courts, whereby such suit may be prosecuted to effect;" and, on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 8, nays 77, as follows:

YEAS.—John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Daniel Heister, William Hindman, Henry Latimer, Andrew Pickens, Thomas Scott, and Silas Talbot.

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Theodorius Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Isaac Coles, William J. Dawson, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, George Hancock, William Hindman, Andrew Pickens, Silas Talbot, and Thomas Scott.

Van Allen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Peter Van Gasbeck, Abraham Venable, Peleg Wadsworth, Francis Walker, John Watts, Benjamin Williams, Paine Wingate, Richard Winn, and Joseph Winston.

The resolution of the Senate, containing the said proposed article of amendment, was then read the third time, as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the said Constitution, viz: "The Judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against any of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State."

And on the question that this House doth concur with the Senate in the said proposed article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 9, as follows:

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the committee had again had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which he delivered in at the clerk's table, where the same was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That, for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, there be appropriated a sum of money, not exceeding one million four hundred and fifty seven thousand nine hundred and thirty-six dollars and one cent; that is to say:

For the pay of the Legion of the United States	$303,684 00
For subsistence	312,567 75
For clothing	81,682 00
For forage	112,000 00
For equipments for the cavalry	7,314 05
For horses for the cavalry	16,000 00
For bounty	5,000 00
For the Hospital Department	20,000 00
For the Ordnance Department	6,715 82
For repairs and articles directed to be made and purchased by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES	202,783 84
For defensive protection of the frontiers	180,000 00
For the Indian Department	50,000 00
For the Quartermaster's Department	150,000 00
For contingencies of the War Department	30,000 00
And for Invalid Pensions	80,289 55
	$1,457,936 01

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. Boudinot, Mr. TRUMBULL, and Mr. GILLESPIE, do prepare and bring in the same.

WEDNESDAY, March 5.

An engrossed bill authorizing a loan of one million of dollars was read the third time.

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, and that the title be, "An act authorizing a loan of one million of dollars."

A petition of the manufacturers of hats, in the towns of Fredericksburg, and Falmouth in the State of Virginia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that an additional duty may be imposed upon the importation of hats from foreign countries; and that such duties may be laid on the exportation of beaver and other furs from the United States, as shall be sufficient to encourage and protect domestic manufactures. Also, the several petitions of the manufacturers of hats in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. COIT, Mr. HINDMAN, Mr. DEXTER, Mr. GILES, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. PAGE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report thereon, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. DEARBORN, from the committee appointed to report on the expediency of establishing a light-house on the island of Seguin, at the mouth of the river Kennebeck, in the District of Maine, made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That it is expedient for the United States to establish a light-house on the island of Seguin, near the entrance of the river Kennebeck, in the District of Maine.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. TRACY, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide a naval armament; which was read twice and committed.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole on the report relative to placing the ports and harbors of the United States in a posture of defence—Mr. BORDINOR in the Chair.

The report was read. It states that the following ports and harbors ought to be put in a state of defence, to wit: Portland, in Maine; Portsmouth, in New Hampshire; Cape Ann, Salem, Marblehead, Boston, in Massachusetts; Newport, Rhode Island, New London, Connecticut; New York; Philadelphia; Baltimore; Norfolk; Wilmington, North Carolina; Ocracoke Inlet, Charleston, South Carolina; Savannah, Georgia. The fortifications to be of a nature to defend the several ports and harbors against surprise by naval armaments; that the several places to be fortified be garrisoned by troops in the pay of the United States.

From the estimates it appears that the sums necessary to erect the fortifications amount to

$76,053 25
That two hundred cannon will be necessary, which, with their carriages, &c., amount to 96,645 00
$172,698 25

The annual expenses of the troops necessary to garrison the several fortifications, including pay, subsistence, &c., $90,349 25.

The committee state that, in their opinion, the security of the United States renders it necessary to provide the cannon, whether the fortifications should be erected or not. The report goes on to state the expense which would probably be incurred at the several places mentioned; the aggregate of which is as above stated.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, who was on the select committee, observed that it must appear to the Committee of the Whole, that the report was substantially a recommendatory measure, the carrying of which into execution must eventually depend on various circumstances; all that Congress can do, he added, was to vote a sum of money; and leave the execution of the plan to the discretion of the President of the UNITED STATES, to be completed in such manner as he may find expedient. The Committee went through the report; some alterations were made by increasing the number of places to be fortified, and diminishing the number of cannon in others, so that the aggregate of the expense remains the same.

Mr. FITZSIMONS then moved sundry resolutions for carrying the report into effect; these were severally put and agreed to; as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to cause such of the ports and harbors of the United States to be put into a state of defence, as he may judge necessary, and that a sum, not exceeding — dollars, be provided for that purpose.

Resolved, That provision ought to be made for procuring one hundred cannon of thirty-six pounders, and one hundred of twenty-four pounders, with carriages and implements for the same.

That carriages and implements for one hundred and fifty cannon, with five hundred and sixty tons of cannon shot, ought to be procured, and that a sum not exceeding — be provided for the purpose aforesaid.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to employ such part of the troops, on the Military Establishment of the United States, as he may judge necessary, in any of the fortifications which may be erected for the defence of any of the ports or harbors of the United States.

The Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported the amendments and resolutions to the House.

The amendments were to insert Penobscot, Machias, Newburyport, Annapolis, and Georgetown, South Carolina, as places to be fortified; the several amendments and resolutions were adopted by the House. And it was Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODRICH, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. FORREST, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. BORDINOR, Mr. PARKER, Mr. MACON, Mr. WINS, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. WATTS, Mr. ORR, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. LATIMER, and Mr. DAYTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

The following Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The Secretary of State having reported to me upon the several complaints which have been lodged in his office against the vexations and spoliations on our commerce since the commencement of the European war, I transmit to you a copy of his statement, together with the documents upon which it is founded.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 5, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. HEISTER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the Speech of the President of the UNITED STATES as respects arms and military stores, magazines and arsenals, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. SWIFT, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Josiah Witter, made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to make a report of the pension list of the United States, who have obtained certificates from the Circuit Courts, signed as Commissioners, or from the District Judge of the Court of Maine, for the purpose that Congress may place on the pension list those claimants whose cases come clearly within the description of law.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize Ephraim Kimberly to locate the land warrant issued to him for services in the late American army; which was read twice and committed.

THURSDAY, March 6.

A petition of John Jordan and Thomas Knight, of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that they may receive the proportion of prize money due to them as marines on board the Continental ship Bon Homme Richard, under the command of Captain John Paul Jones, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Secretary of War, with instructions to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A memorial of sundry merchants of the town of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, whose names are thereunto subscribed was presented to the House and read, praying that a Naval force may be provided adequate to the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine corsairs.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill to provide a Naval armament.

A petition of Bradley and Mix, of New Haven, 3d Cox.—16 in the State of Connecticut, was presented to the House and read, praying that an additional duty may be laid on the importation of metal buttons from foreign countries, or such encouragement given to the manufacture of the said article within the United States as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. COIT, Mr. HINDMAN, Mr. DEXTER, Mr. GILES, Mr. DAYTON, and Mr. PAGE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. BORDINOR, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill transferring, for a limited time, the jurisdiction of suits and offences from the District to the Circuit Court of New Hampshire, and assigning certain duties in respect to Invalid Pensions, to the Attorney of the said District; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill providing for destroying certificates of certain descriptions, and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill allowing Lieutenant Colonel Towsard an equivalent for his pension for life; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, do lie on the table.

Mr. WATTS, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Stephen Paraque, made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the said Stephen Paraque be permitted to unlade his cargo in the port of New York, on giving bond and security for the duties thereof to the Collector of the said port of New York, on the usual credit of six, nine, and twelve months, to be computed from the time of unloading.

Ordered, That a bill be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. WATTS, Mr. HEATH, and Mr. CARRIS, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the

H. or R.]

Slave Trade—Naval Armament.

[MARCH, 1794.]

committee appointed to prepare and report such Standing Rules and Orders of proceeding as may be proper to be observed in this House; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

SLAVE TRADE.

The House went into Committee of the Whole on the bill to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the ports of the United States—Mr. BOURNOR in the Chair.

The two first sections of the bill were agreed to, with one alteration moved by Mr. TRUMBULL, which was to give the District Court as well as the Circuit Courts cognizance of the offence.

The third section, which relates to the penalty, &c., it was moved should be struck out. This motion was negatived. It was then moved to insert the word foreign before "ship or vessel," which was agreed to.

The Committee proceeded through the bill, which was reported to the House with sundry amendments; these were agreed to by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

FRIDAY, March 7.

An engrossed bill to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill providing for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1794," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress in the present session, and what part of the business now depending may be, without great inconvenience, postponed until the next session, that the proceedings may be so regulated as to close this session by the first Monday in April next.

NAVAL ARMAMENT.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to provide a Naval armament—Mr. BOURNOR in the Chair.

In the first section Mr. S. SMITH moved to strike out 20 guns, and to insert 36; which makes the force proposed, four ships of 44 guns, and two of 36 guns each. The Committee proceeded through the several sections of the bill, and made sundry amendments in respect to officers, ratings, &c.

Mr. B. BOURNOR observed, that the force contemplated would afford no protection to the commerce of the United States, for the present season as it would require several months to build and equip the ships. He therefore moved to add another section, the object of which was to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to provide a temporary protection, until the ships proposed by the bill shall be ready.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, the bill did not restrict the PRESIDENT to ships to be built; he may use his discretion in procuring the requisite force.

The motion, after some debate, was negatived. Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

MONDAY, March 10.

The memorials of sundry merchants, mariners, tradesmen, and other citizens of the county of Norfolk, and the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, were presented to the House and read, respectively praying that a law may pass imposing further restrictions and higher duties on the importation of articles of the growth or manufacture of such foreign Kingdoms or countries as have not entered into a Commercial Treaty with the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorials be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, accompanying a statement of the gross sum of money which was expended in the year 1790, in making the Treaty with the Creek Indians at New York; and, also, of the amount of presents made to the Creek and Cherokee Nations, since the said Treaty, pursuant to the resolution of this House of the 3d instant; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1794;" and the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, for the appointment of a Joint Committee of the two Houses to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress in the present session, and what part of the business now depending may be, without great inconvenience, postponed until the next session, that the proceedings may be so regulated as to close this session by the first Monday in April next. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the said resolution, and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. MURRELL, and Mr. KIRTEA, be appointed a committee on the part of this House.

National Defence—Naval Armament.

[H. or R.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. SEDGWICK this day gave notice, that on Wednesday next he should submit to the consideration of the Legislature certain resolutions, the object of which would be the means of defence required by our present situation, and the funds which might be required to defray the expense. This notice was introduced by Mr. S. with the following previous observations:

He said he had heretofore done himself the honor to declare to the House, that, in his opinion, it was the duty of the Legislature, as the guardians of the public safety, at a time when Europe was convulsed, and this country suffering many injuries, to provide for its defence, and, as events might happen, to avenge its injuries. That the preservation of peace, an object so necessary to our political and individual happiness, might materially depend on the wisdom and firmness of the Legislature in this respect. That he had hoped and expected some plan for these important purposes would, before this time, have been presented to Congress; that, in his opinion, it would be unpardonable to leave our country in this naked and exposed situation, during the approaching recess; that it ought no longer to remain uncertain whether the property and best interests of our citizens were to remain in a situation to be insulted and injured with impunity. He said he should forbear to give even the outlines of the system which his own mind had embraced, because he should always be willing to prefer any other more competent to the end. His only object at present was, to call the reflections of gentlemen to this important subject.

NAVAL ARMAMENT.

The engrossed bill providing a naval armament for the protection of the commerce of the United States, was read a third time. A motion was made to recommit it to a Committee of the Whole House. This motion was principally supported on the ground of the Select Committee having deviated from the report of the Committee of the Whole; which report connected the ways and means of defraying the expense of the armament with the details of the armament, whereas the bill contains no such estimate. It was further observed, that no injury could result from a short delay, equal to what would be the consequence of sanctioning such a flagrant deviation on the part of the Select Committee from the established rules of the House: that it was quite a new thing to hurry a business of such magnitude through the House.

The motion to recommit the bill was negatived. In opposition to the motion, it was ironically observed, that as the carrying trade and the trade to the Mediterranean were of so trifling importance, it was really surprising that the business of providing a protection for the commerce of this country, exposed at this moment to the depredations of the Algerines, should be hurried with so much impetuosity through the House! Three months have already elapsed, the greater part of which this subject has been under consideration; to steer clear, therefore, of impetuosity in conducting the business, three months more ought to be suffered to pass before anything is done. With respect to the conduct of the Select Committee, it was said that, in the first discussion of the subject, the report was objected to on account of the ways and means being connected with it; to remove this objection, the bill was reported in the form before the House.

The motion being put for recommitting, it passed in the negative, 48 to 41. The House then proceeded to fill up the blanks. In the course of filling up the blanks, the opposition to the bill was revived on old and new grounds. The first were on account of its incompetency to the object, considering the resources of the Algerines and the superior policy of having recourse to negotiation, and purchase of a peace; the new ground was derived from recent confidential communications, from which it was inferred, that the eligibility of the mode of procuring a peace by purchase was greatly strengthened. From this view of the subject a transition was made to the subject of navies generally, in which the bad consequences connected with their establishment were depicted in animated terms.

The blanks were all filled; and on the question Shall the bill pass? Mr. GILES observed, that, from the sense of the House several times manifested upon this subject, there remained no doubt but that the bill would pass. In that event, he most earnestly hoped that the success of the measure would, at least, equal the expectations of its advocates. Indeed, he hoped that their expectations would be disappointed and exceeded; for it did not seem to him that even they were very positive as to its full competency to the end proposed. He even wished that every ship could be furnished with the cap of Fortunatus and the shield of Hercules; for he was persuaded that, in the present state of things, some magical influences would be found essential to enable them to effect their undertaking. He observed, that, at present, the wisdom or folly of the proposed measure was mere matter of opinion; but the passage of the bill will furnish futurity with a complete experiment of its true character.

He intended to offer his reasons against the passage of the bill, not with a hope of making proselytes, but as a testimony of the real motives which influenced his opposition. With this view, he should only mention some of the general impressions produced on his mind by this subject, without fatiguing the House with minute explanations of them. The subject had presented itself to him in two points of view—1st, as affording a protection to our commerce against the Algerine depredations; 2d, as the foundation of a permanent naval establishment. He could not help premising that, in the course of discussion, the advocates of the bill had censured its opponents with a want of disposition for the protection of commerce, whilst they claimed a monopoly of all good intention towards this object. He did not mean to derogate from the good intention of the favorers of the bill, but he believed its opponents possessed as pure a zeal for the protection and due encouragement of commerce as its advocates. It is not a question whether commerce is, or is not, to be protected; but whether the plan proposed be the most effectual and the least expedient that can be devised for that purpose! The difference of opinion does not consist in the end to be produced, but in the means proposed to effect the end.

The first objection he should make to the bill would be, the obvious inadequacy of the means contemplated to effect the end proposed by them. The object proposed is an effectual resistance, not only to the whole present naval force of Algiers, but to their whole naval ability. The bill contains, in itself, essentially a declaration of war. Our calculations, therefore, should be extended to the utmost limit of the naval ability of the hostile nation. The means to be employed consist of four frigates of forty-four guns each and two ships of thirty-six guns each. To decide with propriety upon the objection, this force should be compared with the naval ability of Algiers. He did not mean to go into a minute history of Algiers. He should only observe, in general, that it was a populous country; that it had furnished at one time one hundred thousand fighting men; that its power at this day was as great as at any preceding period; that they were a warlike people, accustomed to naval enterprises and desperate in naval engagements; that, for some time past, they had been subsidized for peace by almost every European nation. He could not help concluding, from these circumstances, that the naval ability of the nation either was or might, without any uncommon exertions, be rendered superior to four forty-four gun frigates and two thirty-six gun ships, the force contemplated by the bill, and, if the conclusions were just, the bill is unwise.

In the course of the debate, it has been replied to the argument of the ability of the nation, deduced from the number of men it has brought into the field, that the naval armament was not intended to attack the invincible militia of Algiers. This is true, but it is no refutation of the argument. The fact exhibits the ability of the nation upon land, and the inference from it has been, that, if Algiers can exert such an ability upon land, by changing the direction of her ability, she would certainly furnish a force at sea greatly superior to the armament proposed. The history of her former naval exertions would also justify this conclusion. Providing this armament would naturally turn the attention of Algiers to the increase of her naval strength; and he doubted the policy of measures which would produce that effect, without the United States were determined to enter into a competition for naval power with the nations of Europe. Naval exertions have been carried to such excess that there is scarcely any thing which furnishes more scope for comparison. Several nations, possessing a much greater naval strength than is contemplated by this bill, he believed, were at war with Algiers at this moment, yet her corsairs swim in the ocean, regardless of their enemy, and hardly recollecting that they are in a state of war. He thought it unsafe to calculate upon any peculiar invincibility in the armament now proposed, and, without such a quality, although he hoped their efficacy, yet he feared their inefficacy.

He should fear the result, if the contest, in other respects, were to be upon equal terms. But that will not be the case. The armament will meet with peculiar embarrassment from the expected scene of action. They are to act three thousand miles from home, without the guarantee or even the prospect of a friendly port; they are to continue the whole year upon their station, and to be subject to attack whenever the enemy may think proper; they will also be continually exposed to a tempestuous ocean. Under these circumstances they must act upon the most disadvantageous terms, which will lessen extremely their prospect of success. The advocates of the 'bill have admitted the necessity of finding some friendly ports in the Mediterranean seas, and several have been mentioned—Cathagen, Gibraltar, &c.—but their hopes appeared to him to be wholly chimerical.

He did not know how far it might be proper to have reference to confidential communications to present this part of the subject in its true light. He thought, however, he might be permitted to mention, in general, that it has been officially communicated to the House that the truce with Algiers, which has produced the injury to our commerce, against which the present remedy is directed, is part of the system of the combination against France. The mildest apology from Great Britain for her interposition has been to enable Portugal to act more efficaciously in the common cause of despots. Other effects, equally important to that end, will result, and no doubt were taken into the estimate. They all may resolve themselves into the embarrassments produced to our commerce. This information cannot be questioned. If, then, the Algerine truce be part of the system of the combination against France, is it probable that the Combined Powers will afford their ports for the protection of an armament intended to interrupt and destroy that part of the system? May it not rather be inferred that they will send their aid to their allies, the Algerines, to destroy the force sent against them? Have we hopes against this natural and obvious consequence from the good dispositions of the Combined Powers towards us? Have we any hopes from their inability to effect the object? For his part, he thought it was in vain to hope for a contrary result. From these reflections, occurs another obvious objection to the measure—its direct tendency to war. Upon another occasion, it has been said, that Great Britain particularly is irritable towards us, and all measures ought to be avoided which might tend to increase the irritability. It really has become a question for this House, for all America, to determine, and particularly the lovers of peace, whether a naval armament calculated to resist part of the system of the combination against France, and destined to act in the very scene of war, or imposing higher duties upon some articles of imports, and making an act for the regulation of our own navigation, possess the greatest tendency to war?

For his part, if the proposed armament should be provided, he had but one consolation against this palpable effect of it. But that consolation furnished the strongest argument against the measure. The trees are now growing out of which the frigates are to be built. A considerable time must, of course, elapse before these trees can be put into the shape of frigates. From the present agitation and fluctuation of European affairs, great changes before that time may be effected, and the necessary delay in equipping the armament will be the only chance of avoiding a war by means of the measures. If the frigates were now afloat, and engaged in the expedition against Algiers, he should view the United States in a state of actual hostility against the whole combined Powers. But the necessary delay, which may furnish the only security against war, as a result of the measure, proves the folly of an expensive armament, which, before it can be provided, the fluctuation of European affairs may render wholly unnecessary.

Another objection to the measure consists of the certainty and enormity of the expense, with a total uncertainty of its efficacy; whereas, the plan of purchasing a peace regards economy, if its efficacy should be doubted. In this case, if the object be not effected, the money will not be expended. It is but a bad character of a measure, to say it is neither certain in its object, nor economical in its arrangement; yet these are the most striking traits in the present bill. When this measure was first brought into view, it was thought necessary that an estimate should accompany it. This estimate, he knew not for what reason, was kept out of view. It was, nevertheless, an estimate, and must again make its appearance in the House. He expected, too, that it would appear in a more formidable shape than when it was first introduced. The pay of the seamen, the most important item in the estimate, had varied its shape materially. It is now calculated at double the estimate first made, and he apprehended that the same fate would attend other parts of the estimate. He admitted that the sum mentioned in the bill did not positively fix the wages of the seamen, but was intended as a limit to the Parliament's discretion. He was inclined to think, however, from the nature of the service, that the whole sum would be found necessary; for all the other perquisites which the seamen will expect must consist of toil and danger.

He observed, that the intelligence lately received, in his opinion, served to confirm all those objections, although he supposed it had affected the minds of other gentlemen very differently ; because he had observed more votes in favor of the bill since the receipt of the intelligence than before that period. The intelligence being communicated in confidence, he supposed it would be improper to particularize those parts of it which affected his opinion. He should, therefore, only remark, in general, that the intelligence had led his mind to these two conclusions :

1st. That the force to be provided is absolutely inadequate to the object.

2d. That, by proper management, a due attention to time and opportunity, a peace may be effected by money.

In either case, the naval armament would be rendered unnecessary, and the expense ought not to be incurred.

Mr. G. proceeded to consider the bill as the foundation of a permanent naval establishment. He said there was a clause in the bill authorizing the President to suspend all proceedings in the equipment of the armament, in case of a peace with Algiers, which gave him some consolation ; but it did not altogether relieve his apprehensions from this operation of the measure, because he knew that a permanent naval establishment was a favorite policy with some gentlemen, and because the argument had been urged in favor of the present bill.

He observed that a permanent naval establishment could be recommended to the United States but from one or both of the following considerations: Either upon the principle of entering into a competition for naval power with the Powers of Europe; or as affording security to the collection of our own revenue.

He thought the question of a permanent naval establishment was one of the most important which could be presented to the consideration of the House, and that the most serious consequences were necessarily connected with it. In the first place, he viewed the establishment of a navy as a complete dereliction of the policy of discharging the principal of the public debt. History does not afford an instance of a nation which continued to increase their navy and decreased their debt at the same time. It is an operation exceeding the ability of any nation. The naval competition of the Powers in Europe has produced oppression to their subjects and ruin to themselves. The ruin of the French Monarchy, he believed, might be ascribed very much to that cause. A navy is the most expensive of all means of defence, and the tyranny of Governments consists in the expensiveness of their machinery. The expensiveness of the French Monarchy is the true cause of its destruction. The navy of France furnished the principal item of that expense. The navy produced expense, the expense exceeded the revenue, new contributions became necessary, the people saw the tyranny, and destroyed the tyrant. The same effect, by the same policy, will probably be produced in great Great Britain. The Government is not yet destroyed, but the people are oppressed, liberty is banished. The extensiveness of the Government is the true ground of the oppression of the people. The King, the Nobility, the Priesthood, the Army, and, above all, the Navy.

All this machinery lessens the number of the productive and increases the number of unproductive hands of the nation in Great Britain. The operation has been extended so far that the poor rates alone probably afforded a greater tax per capita than the whole taxes paid in the United States. He was astonished, with ample before our eyes, that these gentlemen who would wish to enter into this fashionable system of politics. He said the United States had already progressed full far enough into this system; for, exclusively of the ordinary expense of the Civil List, a debt had been funded upon principles of duration. An Army had been raised, at an immense expense, and now there was a proposition for a Navy. He observed that, for several years past, the appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment had exceeded a million of dollars per annum—from one million to one million and a half annually. He believed that, if the expense had been foreseen, there would have been more active efforts to have avoided it. It was a policy, at this day, very generally condemned; yet we are now to exhibit a counterpart of this policy upon the ocean, with this aggravation: that it will commence with greater certain expense, and with a more uncertain object. The system of governing by debts he conceived the most refined system of tyranny. It seems to have been a contrivance devised by politicians to succeed the old system of feudal tenures. Both systems were tyrannical, but the objects of their tyranny were different. The system of feuds operated upon the person of the individual—the system of debts operates upon the pockets of the individual. In the feudal system, the tenant often received some indulgence and lenity from the martial generosity which generally characterized the Lord. The Lord was gratified with the acknowledgment of the tenant that he was a slave, and the rendition of a pepper-corn as an evidence of it. The product of the tenant's labor was left for his own support. The system of debts affords no such indulgences. Its true policy is to devise objects of expense, and to draw the greatest possible sum from the people in the least visible mode. It boasts not of economizing in calls upon the people for contributions. It boasts not of economizing in the objects of expenditure. It consults the obedience, and not the happiness of the people. There is no device which facilitates the system of expense and debts so much as a Navy. And he declared, from that consideration, he should value his liberty at a lower price than he now did, if the policy of a permanent Naval Establishment should obtain in the United States.

He saw another strong objection to the establishment of a Navy. He deemed it a hostage to its full value for our good behaviour to the great naval Powers, until it should be able to contend with them for the ocean. It will increase rather than lessen our dependence upon them.

With respect to the other considerations, their utility in affording an additional security for the collection of the revenue, he should make but one observation. When revenue is laid, the expense of the machinery employed in the collection is the primary consideration. These vessels may, therefore, be considered as aquatic sheriffs, but of the most expensive order. They will be an additional cost of at least twenty per centum upon the whole revenue collected. The expense in-carried, therefore, will exceed the security afforded, and of course ought not to be incurred. Upon the whole, if these considerations were not sufficient to induce the House to negative the bill, he conceived the impressions produced upon his own mind by them would furnish a justification for his opposition. He said, if the bill should pass, he should, however, find a consolation in a consciousness of his own fallibility, and a respect for the opinions of the majority, who advocated it; but, impressed as he was with the subject, he felt it a duty, as far as he could, to give a veto to the measure.

Mr. W. SMITH remarked, that though it was not probable any proselytes were to be expected at this late period of the business, and after so ample a discussion as the question had received in its different stages, yet he considered it necessary to make a reply to some of the various objections which had just been made to the passing of the bill. Many of those objections appeared to him totally inapplicable to the subject, which he should pass over in silence. If it were the design of the House to incur a vast expense in the establishment of a Navy, merely for the idle purposes of vain parade, there would be force in some of the objections; but, as this was not the case, and as the measure was a measure not of choice, but of necessity, extorted by the pressure of unavoidable events, he did not feel their force in any respect. The question was, simply whether our commerce required protection against the Algerine corsairs, and whether this was the best mode of protection. The first part of the question was admitted on all sides. For himself, he had always considered the second equally clear. But in the course of the discussion, various difficulties had been started against the mode of protection, and various substitutes had been proposed, as offering a remedy more prompt, more effectual, and less expensive. He would first consider the proposed substitutes for a naval armament, and then answer the objections to it. The substitutes were: 1st. To purchase a peace of the Algerines. 2d. To depend on Portugal breaking her truce with Algiers, and shutting up their cruisers within the Straits. 3d. To pass commercial regulations against Great Britain. 4th. To subsidize other nations to protect our commerce.

To these several substitutes, he might, in a few words, object that the first was impracticable, the second precarious, the third inoperative, and the fourth dishonorable. But he would, more in detail, evince their futility by a few observations:

1st. With respect to the purchase of a peace. The late communications must satisfy every one who had attended to them, that all hope on that score must be abandoned, unless there was a manifestation of some force on the part of this country, which might give effect to pacific negotiations. As long as our vessels were so easy and so tempting a prey to the cupidity of those rovers, it would be vain to expect that they would sell a peace for any thing like the price which the Government would be willing to give, or that a peace, even if effected, would be of any duration. If the Executive formerly experienced such difficulties when the Algerines had captured only one or two of our vessels, and their cruisers were confined to the Mediterranean by the Portuguese squadron, how much less prospect was there of success after they had captured a considerable number of our ships, were likely to capture many more, and were at liberty to cruise in the Atlantic, even to our very coasts! And that little prospect of success would be diminished, when the Dey of Algiers should understand that we took no measures to protect our trade, and were afraid of the expense of a small armament. Even should a peace be purchased, the temptation to break it would be so great, that we ought not to expect it would be long observed. But if the Dey knew that we had some naval strength, and were resolved to protect our trade, he would find his account not only in making peace with us, but in maintaining it.

2d. To rely on the chance of Portugal breaking her truce, was putting our commerce and the liberty of our seamen on a very precarious footing indeed. It was impossible to say how long Portugal might continue at peace with Algiers; and it had been remarked, that the truce had been accomplished by the intervention of the British and Spanish Courts, without the knowledge or assent of Portugal; but Mr. S. was persuaded the latter part of this allegation was without foundation. Portugal must have consented to it, and it was therefore probable she would maintain peace with Algiers as long as the policy of the British Court, with whom she was clearly connected, should dictate.

3d. It was proposed to put a stop to the depredations of the Algerines by certain commercial restrictions aimed at Great Britain. Admitting, for a moment, the ultimate efficacy of these restrictions, which, like a panacea, were to cure all our ills, the remedy must be very remote. These regulations could not pass into a law till the close of the session, allowing a moderate time for their discussion in both Houses. A distant period must then be assigned for their operation, in order not to create too sudden and violent a disturbance to the course of trade, and to allow a reasonable time to merchants to make their arrangements. A certain time must, then, elapse before their effect would be felt by Great Britain, and a still further time before it could be felt, by a kind of re-action, by Algiers. In the interim, the Algerines would seize our vessels, and carry hundreds of our fellow-citizens into captivity.

4th. The last substitute was, to subsidize other nations. Besides the national dishonor of depending upon others for that protection which was in our own power, Mr. S. said there were several objections to this project. Either the nations in contemplation were at Peace with the Regency of Algiers, or they were not: if the former, it was not to be expected that they would relinquish that peace for any indemnification the United States could make them. If they were at war, they had sufficient inducement to check the depredations of their enemies without our subsidies. In addition to these objections, such a protection would be hazardous, as it would be at any time in the power of the nation we should employ, when engaged thereto by any Power envious of our prosperity, to conclude a truce with Algiers, and leave us at the mercy of her corsairs.

Having a navy of our own we might co-operate to advantage with any of the Powers at present at war with the Algerines, but it would be risking too much to depend altogether on any of them.

Mr. S. next reviewed the principal objections to the bill. These were, he said, 1st. That the force contemplated was incompetent. 2d. That sending an armed force on the ocean would be the means of involving us in a war with some of the maritime Powers. 3d. That we had no friendly ports in Europe, which our frigates could resort to for supplies or refitment. 4th. That the expense would exceed the object to be protected. 5th. That our trade would be deprived of the sea-men required to man the frigates. 6th. That it was now so late in the season we could not protect our vessels the ensuing Summer, and that some favorable events might occur before the frigates could be equipped, which would render them unnecessary. 7th. That this was the beginning of a Naval Establishment, which would hereafter involve this country in immense debts and maritime wars.

1st. To the first objection, Mr. S. replied that he was surprised those gentlemen who deemed the number of frigates inadequate to the object, had never proposed to increase the quantum of force; though this objection had been re-echoed by several gentlemen, none of them had thought proper to move an augmentation of the strength. The only motion of that nature had proceeded from a quarter which had been always friendly to the measure. From the documents on the table, and from the diligent inquiries of a large committee, the force contemplated by the bill did, however, appear inadequate. The number and strength of the Algerine corsairs had been pretty nearly ascertained; it had been stated, from good authority, that these vessels were slight, and that they did not cruise in fleets, but scattered, for the purpose of plunder. It also appeared that a smaller force than ours had been successfully employed by Portugal in blocking up the Straits.

2d. The second objection arose from the danger of being involved in a war. It had been said that some of the maritime Powers, whose interest it was that our commerce should suffer from these piratical depredations, would see with displeasure our armed vessels on the ocean, and would insult them; and that our officers would resent such insults, and thus draw us into a war. If there were any nation so anxious to go to war with us, as this objection supposes, they would be at no loss for pretexts without this. If, while we were exercising so just, lawful, and necessary a right as that of using the only means in our power of protecting our commerce from ruin, and our fellow-citizens from a most dreadful captivity, any nation should wickedly and wantonly interfere, and molest our frigates, it would show such a disposition to quarrel with us, and be such an act of hostility, as would justify war on our part. Whatever nation it might be, he should view such an aggression as the effect of a predetermined hostility, and should not hesitate a moment to consider them as much our enemies as the Algerines themselves. But this armament would furnish so little pretence for any danger of this kind, that he viewed all such terrors as chimerical. Indeed, it was somewhat strange, that these apprehensions should have been suggested by gentlemen who considered commercial restrictions particularly directed at Great Britain as of a most pacific tendency. If irritating measures, pointedly directed at Great Britain, were not likely to excite a hostile spirit in her, much less was it to be expected that measures of unavoidable necessity against the Algerine pirates, would excite that spirit.

3d. It had been clearly shown that there were many convenient friendly ports to which our vessels of war should have access. Spain, Portugal, and France, have been mentioned. It was not probable we should be at war with all those Powers at the same time. Being at peace with them all, we had a right to expect a friendly admission into their ports. A state of war would undoubtedly present many difficulties, but even in that event, the proposed measure did not appear less indispensable.

4th. The expense had been strongly urged as a weighty objection. Mr. S. observed, that the saving in insurance, the value of our ships and cargoes, the ransom of our captive seamen, was more than an offset against this item. But was not the slavery of our fellow-citizens, the national disgrace resulting from it, to be taken into the account? These were, in his mind, considerations beyond all calculation. Who could, after reading the affecting narratives of Captain Penrose and the other unfortunates, sit down contented with cold calculations and dry syllogisms? These narratives ought to excite every possible exertion, not only to procure the release of the captured, but to prevent an increase of the number of these unhappy victims. This could only be effected by the proposed measure; it was the only practicable mode of obtaining a peace, which would insure the release of the captives, and of preventing the capture of others. Were the expense, therefore, doubtless the sum proposed, he, for one, would not hesitate to vote for it.

5th. It had been alleged that depriving our merchant vessels of the seamen requisite to man the frigates, would be a serious injury to our trade. No further answer was necessary to this objection, than barely to remark, that the injury was not to be put in competition with the loss of seamen by slavery in Algiers, or by desertion from merchant ships, so unprotected and exposed.

6th. The lateness of the season had furnished another objection. Mr. S. asked whose fault it was, that this measure had not been adopted sooner? The members whose opinions coincided with his, and himself had urged the necessity of it near three months ago, but the persevering opposition it had encountered, and the intervention and discussion of the commercial regulations had protracted it to the present period. Late as it is, however, it is still necessary, and the best expedient which has been suggested. The very circumstance of preparation for naval defence, would facilitate our negotiation for peace, and would encourage our seamen to remain in our service. He wished it always to be understood, that he did not rely solely on the efficacy of this armament. He still looked forward to a negotiation, and was ready to provide the most ample means for that purpose; but he was at the same time satisfied that the first measure must accompany the latter, as the one would be nugatory without the other.

7th. The dangers resulting from a large Navy Establishment, and the immense debts they have created in other countries, had been depicted, and the House had been warned against such evils. How a bill providing six frigates, which were to exist only during the war with Algiers, could excite an apprehension of a large and permanent navy, and an enormous debt, Mr. S. said he was at a loss to discover. The clause which authorized the President, in the event of a peace with the Regency of Algiers, to discontinue the armament, was a complete answer to all the reasoning which had been indulged on the subject of navies and debts. Admitting there had been no such clause, he did not feel the weight or applicability of the reasoning.

This country is peculiarly fitted for a navy: abounding in all kinds of naval resources, we have within ourselves those means which other maritime nations were obliged to obtain from abroad. The nature of our situation, and the navigating disposition of a considerable proportion of our citizens, evince still more the propriety of some Naval Establishment. Perhaps the country is not yet mature for such an establishment, to any great extent; but he believed the period was not far distant, when it would. Sweden, with a population not greater than that of the United States, and with more slender resources, maintained a large navy. He saw no reason why the United States, with an increasing population, much individual wealth, and considerable national resources, might not, without ruin, do as much, or why the equipment of a squadron, inferior to that of any of the petty nations of Italy, should involve us in an insupportable expense.

Having replied to the principal objections against the bill, Mr. S. said, though he did not suppose that any arguments of that day would change a single vote, yet, as a formal and lengthy opposition had been made, he wished to show that he did not rely upon a majority, and that he would never give his assent to a measure which did not, in his opinion, rest on the basis of good policy and propriety. He viewed this measure as resting on that basis; he trusted it would produce the good effects which its friends anticipated, and that, as he was confident it would be supported by a majority of that House, he had little doubt that it would be sanctioned by the approbation of their constituents; but that, even were he persuaded it would be attended with some of the mischiefs which its opponents had predicted, he should still deem himself warranted in supporting it as a thing irresistible and loudly called for by the urgency of existing circumstances.

Mr. GRASS, in reply to Mr. W. SMITH, remarked, that, having just presented the outlines of his opinion upon this subject to the House, he intended not to have troubled the House with any further observations; but the gentleman last up had thrown an imputation upon the humanity of the opposers of the bill, which required an answer. The gentleman has triumphantly asked, "Who can read the representations of the unfortunate captives at Algiers, without giving their assent to the bill?" This question is answered by another: Who can read the representations of the unfortunate captives at Algiers, and give an assent to the bill? The bill contains essentially a declaration of war. The means it provides, are for resistance, not for conquest. The gentleman calls upon our humanity to ameliorate the condition of the captives, by a declaration of war against a barbarian, without furnishing any means which could operate upon his personal fears; or, perhaps, the gentleman conceives that, after the frigates shall have performed wonders upon the water, they would leave the element, boldly march upon the land, and break the chains of the prisoners. This is assigning a new office to the frigates, and if Mr. G. thought they possessed the ability to execute it, he would give his hearty assent to the bill.

But might it not, with more reason and probability, be concluded, that a declaration of war, under such circumstances, would irritate the barbarians and furnish additional misery to the unfortunate prisoners? In the expedient of purchasing a peace, which is the substitute he relied upon, the redemption of the captives will almost necessarily constitute a part of the negotiation. Mr. G. said, the gentleman, on this subject, appeared to have forgotten the whole connexion between cause and effect, and to have disdained all comparison of the means to the end. He believed, if ever there was a measure involving great political consequences, which owed its existence to passion, without one effort of calculation, as far, at least, as it related to its ostensible object, it was the measure contemplated by the bill now before the House.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 50, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Fisher Ames, John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Samuel Dexter, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Samuel Griffin, George Hancock, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Wilkes Kitters, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, William Lyman, Francis Malbone, Peter Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Josiah Parker, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, Samuel Smith, William Smith, Thomas Sprigg, Zephaniah Swift, Silas Talbot, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. NAYS.—Messrs. Theodore Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Caines, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Isaac Coles, William Findley, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, Christopher Greenup, William Barry Grove, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, Daniel Heister, John Hunter, William Irvine, Matthew Locke, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, William Montgomerie, Andrew Moore, Joseph Neville, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, John Page, Francis Preston, John Smilie, Israel Smith, Thomas Tredwell, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, Benjamin Williams, Paine Wingate, and Joseph Winston.

Resolved, That the title of the said bill be, "An act to provide a naval armament."

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time of holding certain Courts; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. WARREN, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Stephen Paraque; which was read twice, and committed.

TUESDAY, March 11.

A memorial of Leighton Wood, junior, Joseph Stretch, and Joshua Dawson, in behalf of themselves and other clerks in the Treasury Department, was presented to the House and read, praying that they may receive such compensation, in addition to the salaries allowed them by law, as may be deemed equitable and proper, to reimburse the extraordinary expenses they incurred in the discharge of their official duties during the late calamity in the city of Philadelphia, where they remained at the great personal hazard of themselves and families.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. TRACY, Mr. MONTGOMERY, and Mr. WILKINS; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. DEARBORN, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for erecting a light-house on the Island of Seguin, in the District of Maine; which was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the head-land of Cape Hatteras, and a lighted beacon on Ocracoke Island, in the State of North Carolina;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The said bill was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

[MARCH, 1794.]

Mr. MADISON, from the committee to whom were referred the petitions of the clerks in several of the Executive Departments of Government, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House on Thursday last, to the bill making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations; and, the same being twice read, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

WEDNESDAY, March 12.

An engrossed bill to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have come to a resolution, "That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to transmit to the Executives of the several States, copies of the article of amendment proposed by Congress to be added to the Constitution of the United States, respecting the Judicial power;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution, and, the same being read, was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year 1794; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee appointed to consider and report on the propriety of remitting the duty on imported bar iron, in certain cases, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the report of the committee to whom was referred so much of the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES as respects arms and military stores, magazines, and arsenals; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, amended, and agreed to by the House, as follow:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to direct two arsenals and magazines, with the necessary buildings, to be erected in proper situations, to accommodate the Southern States; and that the arsenals and magazines at Springfield, Massachusetts, and Carlisle, in Pennsylvania, be repaired; and that a sum not exceeding fifty-nine thousand dollars be provided for that purpose.

Resolved, That a national armory be erected, and that a superintendent, and two master armors, be appointed by the President of the United States, to superintend the same. That so many persons may, from time to time, be employed therein, as the Secretary for the Department of War may judge necessary; and that a sum not exceeding twenty-two thousand eight hundred and sixty five dollars be provided for defraying the expense thereof.

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding one hundred and forty-three thousand six hundred and forty dollars, be provided, for the purpose of purchasing an additional quantity of arms and ammunition.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. FRIZZINGS, Mr. GOODRUE, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. FORREST, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. BORDINOT, Mr. PARKER, Mr. MACOX, Mr. WINN, Mr. GILMAN, Mr. WATTS, Mr. ORR, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. LATIMER, and Mr. DAYTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with translations of two Letters from the Commissioners of His Catholic Majesty to the Secretary of State and of their enclosures.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. SEDGWICK, after some prefatory remarks, offered the following resolutions:

Resolved, That there be raised, armed, and equipped, fifteen regiments of auxiliary troops, to consist of one thousand men, rank and file, each, with the proper officers.

Resolved, That the commissioned officers thereof be appointed as other officers of the United States, and that the non-commissioned officers and privates be enlisted for the term of two years; and, with this condition, that if war should break out within that time between the United States and any foreign European Power, they shall be bound to serve for the term of three years, after the commencement of the war, if the same shall so long continue.

Resolved, That, in case of such war, the officers of the said regiments shall be entitled to the like pay and subsistence, and to equal rank and command, with the officers of the present Military Establishment of the United States; but, except in such case, shall be entitled to pay only for the time they shall actually attend on the days of training and exercise, hereafter mentioned.

Resolved, That each non-commissioned officer and private shall, by virtue of his enlistment, be entitled to a bounty, consisting of a suit of clothes per annum, of the value of twelve dollars, and shall also be entitled to a compensation of half a dollar per day, for each day he shall assemble for the purpose of training or exercising; which, except in case of war with some foreign European Power, shall not exceed twenty-four days in one year; and, in that case, each non-commissioned officer and private shall be entitled to the same pay and rations, and shall be subject to the same rules and regulations as the other troops of the United States.

Resolved, That the said regiments shall be furnished with arms and accoutrements at the expense of the United States, to be returned at the expiration of their term of service.

Resolved, That revenues by taxes or duties, competent to the purpose of defraying the expense of raising and paying the said troops, be provided.

Resolved, That, within two years and six months after the time which shall be prescribed by law for beginning to enlist the said troops, if no war shall in the mean time break out with any foreign European Power, the regiments aforesaid shall be abolished and cease.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized, if in his judgment the safety or welfare of the United States shall require it, to lay an embargo, generally or particularly, upon ships in the ports or harbors of the United States, for a term not exceeding, at any one time, forty days; and also to prohibit, for a like term, generally or particularly, the exportation of commodities from the United States; and such embargo or prohibition to continue, from time to time, until the expiration of fourteen days after the commencement of the session of Congress next ensuing the present.

Mr. SEDGWICK remarked, that his object was the preservation of peace; but as peace may not always be in our power, it may be necessary to prepare for the contrary event, war; and, in this event, something like the measure he proposed would, he believed, be found necessary. His resolutions contemplate giving a bounty of twelve dollars per annum, in a suit of clothes, to each private and non-commissioned officer. This, he believed, would be found sufficient encouragement to enlist, and half a dollar to each on the days of muster he thought also sufficient. This might, indeed, at first view, be thought high pay, but not so if it is considered that the mustering would be an inconvenient interruption in the ordinary labor of the men, which should be compensated for. There might, at first sight, be thought to be an inconsistency in his resolutions, which he would, to prevent misapprehension, explain. In one part of them the men are said to be enlisted for two years, and then again it is expressed, that two years and six months after their enlistment the regiments are to be disbanded; the six months are considered as necessary for collecting the force, and two years their term of service; which is not too long, considering the situation of Europe. This force, organized in the manner proposed, will always be prepared to present a firm countenance in any point of our territory on which an attack may be made. He believed, however, that the experience of Great Britain, during the late war, would prevent them from making any attempts on our territory; he believed it not in the power of any nation to conquer America, or to dismember it, and possess themselves of any section of it.

There is another object, besides defence, to which the force contemplated would be equal. The European Power to which the resolutions point, now entertains hopes of conquest in the West Indies, as an indemnification for the expenses of the war in which they are engaged. At all times, their Colonial possessions in this country, now the Independent United States, were dear to them, and would be doubly dear as the means of supporting their profitable Dominions in the West Indies. He hoped that the thirst for conquest would never direct the Councils of America; but, if we are unfortunately to be driven to the carnage of war, it will be necessary to wound our enemy where he is most vulnerable. The resolutions would, he hoped, undergo a temperate discussion. When possessed of the force contemplated, the adjacent rich Dominions of the nation, whose policy injures us, can easily be struck, and the wound will certainly be severely felt. This impending blow will render that Power cautious; they will reflect on the danger of rousing the resentment of a country so capable of retaliating with vigor. These were the objects he had in view by his resolutions. Objections to them would arise: the jealousy which Republicans bear to standing armies might be mentioned with some weight; a militia would be pointed at as the surest defence. They certainly are so, to a certain extent; the opinion of their efficacy operated to so great a length before our Revolution, that it perhaps in a degree injured us: but experience is the surest guide. A militia must be abandoned as a means of retaliation. The terms of embodying militia are so short, that by the time they have become a competent and effective force they must be disbanded, and then nothing but force can detain them in the field, and the country is left naked and unprotected. Besides, their wages, of necessity, are greater in time of war than those of regular troops, and the want of discipline occasions them to commit a great waste on the property of their fellow-citizens, besides a waste of public property. As long as we depend on a militia alone for repelling foreign injury short of a direct attack on our territory, European nations will not consider us as able to retaliate, and assert our rights. But the scheme proposed will make us more formidable. And as, unless necessity compels, these troops may remain in the bosom of society, and scattered throughout the country, it is impossible that they should be formidable to the liberties of the people; it is impossible that they should have feelings different from those of the community.

One more observation he would make. When he considered the subject in his own mind, two desiderata appeared to him necessary to be united; the organization of an active force with as much speed as possible, and affording protection with the least possible expense. It might not be improper to state, as far as he was able, the probable amount of the expense of the proposed establishment: he had made a little calculation. The regiment is to consist of 1,000 privates: this number is purposely large, that the expense of officers might be less; one sergeant-major, and fifty sergeants, to each regiment, would make the whole number of non-commissioned officers and privates 1,054 men. These, at twelve dollars for the suit of clothes per annum, would make the expense in this article $12,612; and the twenty-four muster days, at half a dollar a day, an equal sum, in all $25,224; which, multipled by 15, the number of regiments, gives a total of $378,440. He had not accurately ascertained the amount of the officers' pay, but believed it would be $14,920; making in the whole $393,260 per annum; the whole expense of the proposed auxiliary or provisional troops. He called them auxiliary, in reference to the 5,000 regulars which now belong to the Military Establishment of the United States, with which we should be able to bring 20,000 men into the field, a number competent to any purpose for which they would be wanted.

H. or R.]

National Defence.

The resolutions contemplate, as a probable contingency, the propriety of laying an embargo on American vessels, and prohibiting the exportation of the produce of the United States. If such an embargo shall be necessary, the operation can be better performed by the President than by the Legislature. In a body as numerous as the Legislature, it is impossible to keep a secret for any length of time, and the delays which the necessary forms require, would be such, that the effect of the measure would be lost before finally adopted; for every ship, and all the produce which possibly could, would immediately be put out of the reach of Government.

The reasons on which this idea of an embargo are founded, are, that Great Britain cannot supply her West Indies except from the United States. If this is in any degree true in peaceable times, how much more powerfully must it operate now, when we have a considerable military force there to feed! In truth, without supplies from this country, they must inevitably abandon a project—with them a favorite one—the conquest of the French West Indies. In this situation of affairs, he believed it would be found proper to put into the hands of the President a power to lay this embargo, and in a moment to prevent all supplies going to the West Indies. On great occasions, confidence must be reposed in the present head of that Department, would prevent all fears of its being abused in his hands. When we are once in the situation contemplated by the resolutions offered, and if we are then obliged to exert the means in our power for our defence, (but he hoped we should not be impelled to this disagreeable necessity,) we can speak a manly language to any one who may attempt to injure or insult us. He was persuaded, that if a country does not respect itself, it will not be respected by other nations; that if a nation is not vigilant in guarding their rights; they soon will have no rights to guard; if they receive insults and injuries with impunity, they will suffer injuries and insults without end. This is not the time for feeble measures. A manly conduct ought to be pursued—a conduct worthy of our brave and honorable constituents; they have strength bravely to assert, and resources to vindicate their rights. He did not wish the Government to hold any language to intimidate: we should tell the belligerent Powers that we can make reasonable allowances for a state of war, but are not to be imposed on. Such firm language, backed by our means of forcing respect, by withholding supplies necessary to them in the prosecution of a darling object, and by an active force ready to strike in a vulnerable quarter, must be heard, and have its due weight.

He next turned his attention to the source from which funds may be drawn for the execution of the plan proposed, and expressed a firm reliance on the patriotism of the people of America, who, he believed, would cheerfully submit and contribute in any manner which Congress might judge proper, in support of their rights, and to vindicate their national honor. He adverted to some observations which fell a few days since from Mr. LEE, which he said did honor to that gentleman; but he could not agree with him in thinking that a land tax was immediately necessary. He believed it as yet unnecessary to touch that great resource; and, if it is unnecessary, it is not expedient. If it must be resorted to, however, he believed the people had virtue and patriotism enough to submit without murmuring.

He concluded by observing, that the nation of whose treatment we have a right to complain, viewing our resources, will reflect seriously on the consequence of imposing any further injuries, and for their own interest's sake, will pursue a different line of conduct, which will permit us to continue in a state of tranquility and friendly intercourse with them.

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

THURSDAY, March 13.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, was read the third time and passed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of fixing buoys on certain rocks lying off the harbor of New London, in the State of Connecticut, and Providence river, in the State of Rhode Island; and that Mr. CORRIE, BENJAMIN BOWEN, and Mr. COBB, be the said committee.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

Mr. FIRTH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed.

FRIDAY, March 14.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," was read twice and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act allowing to Major General Lafayette his pay and emoluments while in the service of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Secretary of State on the privileges and restrictions on the commerce of the United States in foreign countries.

Mr. HARTLEY said: I am exceedingly sorry that this resolution has been pressed upon us at this time, as I hold it would be improper now to adopt it. If we have a war, which is highly probable, the trade will be cut off between these States and Great Britain, and no regulations will be necessary. I am sure no one will say that this resolution, in case of a war, would be an useful or necessary ingredient for our defence. The aggressions have been, so far, totally on the part of Great Britain. As a nation, we may have a right to pass the resolution; but as its consequences are uncertain, and as this may be considered as an act tending to meet Great Britain in hostility, I am not for passing it at present. The enormities of the British lately, upon the high seas, in seizing the vessels and citizens of America, amount to piracy and robbery, and are against the law of nations. They would justify an immediate declaration of war. Prudence may, however, forbid it for the moment. We should go on with our preparations for war, and fall upon effectual measures for our protection. These ought to draw our attention. There is still a possibility of preserving peace. We should adhere to a neutrality until war is inevitable. Let the causes of the war arise from Great Britain. Let us do no act which will throw an imputation upon us. If the aggressions on the part of Great Britain should be continued, or satisfaction not be made for the pass, we may be necessarily involved in war, and we ought to be thinking on the most effectual means to carry it on.

The French Republic expresses herself friendly to the United States. We should not be backward in making return for any of her good offices towards us, provided our acts do not infringe the principles of neutrality. I believe it to be the desire of this country to preserve the neutrality; and, so far as I can learn, even the French Republic do not wish us to be involved in war. We have been insulted and injured by Great Britain in almost every part of the globe. Generous minds would be willing to forget former injuries, but the late conduct of that nation will force us to hate her. I still would wish to avoid a war; but if we are forced into one, and should be unanimous, Great Britain may find us in a better situation than she at present imagines. To the Eastward there is an armed militia of 170,000 men; and, in general, throughout the States, men will be found to act against a common enemy.

May, if we are unanimous, from our situation, we have little to fear from European combinations.

This resolution, if passed by a small majority, would show a division in this country; whereas, in measures at this time, we ought to be as unanimous as possible. There is no necessity for the resolution. My vote, by some, may be considered as unpopular; but I shall do my duty, and am well convinced that my immediate constituents will approve of my conduct.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., next arose. He had felt as keenly the injuries which Great Britain had inflicted on us, as any one on the floor of Congress, but had hitherto been silent, as the public mind, both in and out of doors, was sufficiently inflamed, and required rather to be allayed than further irritated. When the Committee were last on the subject of these resolutions, the country was in a very different situation from what it is now; the commercial relation of the two nations did not call for them; he then and still held the opinion, that commercial and political grievances should not be confounded. On that occasion, therefore, he had avoided advert to the political conduct of the British; he considered only their conduct in a commercial point of view, and, in this light, judged the propositions by no means advisable. As operative on our commercial intercourse with that country in time of peace, they will only be an injury to ourselves, and will affect materially those States where manufactures have not made any great progress, and who have the more bulky articles for exports. This was their opinion of their tendency when they were first brought forward, and it had not changed since. Viewing the subject in a political point of light, the resolutions are by no means sufficiently energetic; both as a peace measure or a war measure, they are equally improper.

When the resolutions were first before the Committee, he had entertained hopes that negotiations with Great Britain, or the events of the European war, would have worked some change in the political conduct of that country, which would enable us to preserve a strict neutrality and avert the horrors of war from our peaceful shores. War is a great evil. The people, from one end of the Continent to the other, show that they prize neutrality, and the unanimous approbation of the pacific measures adopted by the PRESIDENT, show that peace is the wish of the Representatives of the nation. As long, therefore, as a gleam of hope existed of our being able, by means of negotiation, to keep up a good understanding with Great Britain, so long he was opposed to every measure which might tend to interrupt the tranquility. But he was sorry to find, that far from receiving the expected satisfaction, aggressions have been heaped on us with tenfold aggravation. We should, then, reflect on measures proper to guard us against them. The resolutions before the Committee are not calculated, he conceived, to produce this effect; other much more efficient means can certainly be devised. The Legislature should turn their attention to measures of greater energy; they should attend to the immediate defence of the seacoast, the organization of troops, and the means of procuring a revenue to nerve the sinews of war. At present, our commerce yields almost all the revenue that flows into our public coffers. If that commerce is interrupted by a war, we should devise a substitute. A land tax or stamps must be resorted to—a revenue from some source other than commerce must be secured. It was his wish to forbear entering into any measures that had a hostile appearance until the country is placed in a state of defence, and the means of revenue are so organized as to put us out of danger.

When the subject of the resolutions were first before the House, he forbore making any mention of the detention of our posts, the depredations on our commerce in the European seas, and the piracies of the Algerines, because negotiations were then pending of which he hoped a favorable issue, but he owned he was disappointed in his expectations. With respect, however, to the Algerines, though the annoyance we suffer from that quarter is an effect of the unfriendly disposition of the British towards us, yet their conduct in that cannot be construed into direct hostility; and we should, therefore, content ourselves with protecting our commerce against those pirates by a naval armament, or purchase a peace. The resolutions before the Committee, considering the critical state of affairs, are not only too inefficient, but too tardy in their operation. They cannot be intended to operate on this Spring's importation, nor, indeed, upon the importations of the Fall; for, before this time, orders are given, and they cannot be meant to operate so early, because they would have an ex post facto tendency. They are, then, to operate upon the importations this time twelve-month. So feeble and remote an operation cannot answer any good purpose. Why proceed in regulating our commerce, when the commerce is to be saved from annihilation? He was sorry the House did not think proper to go first into the question of an embargo. No doubt this was a question of primary importance; but he believed it would not produce that shock to the commercial interest that some gentlemen feared; as the question was not to lay an embargo, but to empower the President to adopt such a measure when he thought the exigency of affairs required it.

Mr. S. took a view of the operation of the resolutions as manufactures are concerned, and endeavored to show that either we—especially the Southern States—must do without many articles of necessity, that we are accustomed to receive from Great Britain, or pay an exorbitantly increased price for them. He wished to know what rate of increase on the present duties was contemplated by the friends of the resolutions; and whether it was intended to increase the duties laid the other day, when on the subject of ways and means, on certain articles, still higher? The mover of these propositions, he observed, when he first brought them forward, openly declared that he did not wish the duties very high at first, but to raise them gradually. He was desirous of knowing whether the gentleman was of the same mind still, or whether he now contemplated prohibitory duties?

Some gentlemen thought they had discovered an inconsistency in the arguments of those opposed to the resolutions, because they maintained that they might accelerate war, and at the same time are not sufficiently energetic. The observations he believed just. The resolutions will have an irritating, and therefore hostile tendency, and yet they are perfectly impotent in effect in case of hostility. We have reason to contemplate a state of war; we should therefore exert all our means to prepare for such a state. We should fortify our harbors, raise a revenue, organize troops, and put ourselves in complete readiness, yet at the same time we should not hold irritating language. Let us hold out that we wish peace as long as peace can be preserved, and when war is unavoidable, we must meet the event unprepared. He hoped the resolution would be negatived, as a measure inefficient in the present critical situation of affairs, and only tending to irritate unnecessarily.

Mr. GILES conceived that gentlemen built their opinions on an idea, that if we adopt this resolution it is to prevent other measures from being taken. These resolutions he considered as powerful auxiliaries to any other measure which it might be thought prudent to pursue. He proceeded to point out that the resolutions contemplated must have a useful tendency in the event of a war. If a war takes place, a termination to it must be expected; then this system will form the best ground of negotiation. Great Britain, in a negotiation for peace, would certainly be willing to give an equivalent for any relaxation of the regulations meant to be established by the resolutions. In this single point of view, they undoubtedly are a very important engine. The Executive is, by the Constitution, empowered to make treaties; but the Legislature should put the nation in the best possible state to negotiate them on advantageous terms. If we are to have war, the resolutions can, at any rate, do no harm, and at its termination, must produce a great good. If we remain in a state of peace, he believed the first operation of the resolutions would be to increase the revenue; by degrees, only, the importation would be discouraged, and then a spur would be given to our manufactures. He enlarged on this idea, and dwelt further upon the peace operation of the resolutions. He believed there is as yet no deficiency in the revenue of the United States. If a deficiency shall take place, he would be ready to make it up. If our importations, and consequently our impost revenue, should decrease, our ability to pay taxes in another shape will increase in the same proportion. He next animadverted on observations which fell some days since from Mr. LEE, who, he said, had asserted generally that there appeared, within the walls of Congress, a disposition in some to violate the rights of a certain kind of property. He wished the gentleman more explicit as to the persons he referred to, and the expressions that warranted the belief he had expressed. [Mr. G. was interrupted and declared to be out of order.]

Mr. DEXTER said: The less love or hatred we have to foreign nations, the less fear of them will actuate our Councils. We should legislate only for our own country. He made this observation to introduce his principal objections to the resolutions, viz.: that they discriminate between foreign countries, because we hate the one and love the other, and tax our citizens to gratify those passions. This was his principal objection to the resolutions; an objection that no alteration of circumstances could do away; an objection which rests on the immutable interest of this country to be detached from foreign politics as much as possible. It is true, that though these resolutions were adopted, we should be able to adopt any other energetic measure; but he objected to wasting time on this, when more serious concerns call for our attention. If we were attacked by an assassin, should we spend our time in fixing our sword-knot or feather; should we not rather think only of defending ourselves? Should we now spend time in discussing commercial theories? The gentleman last up said, these resolutions would be important at the termination of a war. Surely, then, there is time enough to consider the ground we wish our commerce to stand on at the end of a war which is not yet declared. If we are engaged in a war, our commerce will not require to be regulated, and the passing these resolutions will be an obstacle to peace, rather than tend to secure to us advantages for their relaxation. Another consideration had weight on his mind. Why should we discriminate? Because one nation is hostile and the other friendly? Strong as our partiality may be, where is that European nation that confers acts of kindness on us at the present time? He saw none that merited a return of good offices.

If we are involved in a war with Great Britain, we shall not remain at peace with Spain; and as it is the drift of the resolutions to encourage the commerce of foreign nations, and Spain among others, at the expense of that of Great Britain, then, at the close of the war, the weight which a relaxation of those regulations may have, as far as Great Britain is concerned, will have a contrary and proportional effect so far as Spain is interested, for every diminution of the encouragement granted by law to the Spanish. Nature intended that we should be out of the reach of the politics of Europe. Our interest is loud against the connexion.

If the resolutions are passed, a basis will be laid for a permanent system of commerce with them—a link he never wished to see established. If we meddle with European politics, we may catch the contagion which so unfortunately desolates one fine country, but which is perhaps there a necessary, or at least, unavoidable evil. He feared the effect of dissensions among us; a reign of anarchy would lead to despotism. This he dreaded more than the effects of external aggressions. He wished all thoughts were at present turned to self-defence, to devising and organizing the means.

It was said, that the resolutions had not a tendency to provoke war. If it is the intention of the nation against which they are meant to operate, to make war, it is immaterial in this respect whether they do or do not pass. But to spend time on them, is trifling, at this critical juncture. They may have an injurious tendency. We had been told that the manufacturers and merchants of Great Britain would not suffer the Government to go to war with us. By passing the resolutions, the friends of which say are to operate against those very classes of people, we shall destroy that check, and render a war with us a popular measure. We have much shipping in the ports of our actual, though not yet declared enemies; will any irritating measures tend to the security of that property? Will they not diminish the chance of their being released? By passing the resolutions, we should show our temper without retaliating, and we should unjustly oppress the mercantile interest. It is sufficient to show that the resolutions are inefficient, to prove that they ought not to pass. He believed, if the resolutions had not been brought forward before this day, no member would have thought this a time fit to introduce them; then why now insist upon a decision on them? They are robbed of the object on which they were intended to repel aggressions; they are only a show of resentment, without operation. This is not the time for such feeble measures; our commerce, our very existence as an independent nation, is threatened. The present war is a war of political principles; we must secure ourselves against attack, and avoid all connexion, as much as possible, with European politics. Let the ocean be a gulf of partition between us and the Eastern hemisphere, at least till the present convulsions are at an end.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, he should not attempt to follow the gentleman last up, through his eloquent address, or undertake to go into an answer of the variety of general charges brought forward against the resolutions. He wished only to take notice of one of two points in the debate. It was said, that the existence of the resolutions would rather be a bar to the termination of war, than an inducement with our enemies to make a peace. Is it to be imagined, he asked, if Great Britain intends to drag us into a war, that she has not an object to obtain by it? If she has, she will not abandon it without being compelled. When forced to the necessity of wishing for peace, will she not be disposed to put us in as favorable a situation as before hostilities? But are we prepared to say, that after being dragged into a war, we shall be willing to make peace without obtaining some security that we shall not be molested in future? If he understood what a conduct truly dignified, on such an occasion, ought to be, we should insist not only on a reparation of the injury and insult, but show to the world, that, after obtaining complete satisfaction, we were determined to obtain security against future aggressions. The present measures did not, as has been asserted, originate in favoritism; they are not intended to repay a debt of gratitude; they are drawn forth by the injuries inflicted by one nation, and are meant to benefit the country for which we are sent to legislate. If, however, in their operation, they should benefit France, this was surely no argument against them; on the contrary, it ought to be an additional argument in favor of them, as we owe that nation a debt of gratitude.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK called the attention of the Committee to the immense waste of time which the discussion of these resolutions had occasioned. Two months had been in a great measure spent in discussing them. It was like consulting on the improvements to be made to an edifice threatened by a conflagration. He hoped the question would be taken.

Mr. PAGE, in the present exigency, conceived that nothing would have a better effect than attending to these commercial regulations, which would show our love of peace, and fulfil the great end for which the Federal Government was instituted.

Mr. MURRAY said: When war is staring us in the face, he wondered gentlemen did not feel that the resolutions are not proper. They are bad as a permanent system; bad in the present emergency. He was surprised that the friends of the resolutions, when they were the subject of discussion before, should appear to feel so much from the injuries inflicted by Great Britain, and now that they are increased ten-fold, should not have risen in those feelings. He was surprised to see their minds stationary, though the danger is growing, and to find every measure of energetic defence which had been proposed, opposed by the gentlemen. The present critical juncture called certainly for vigorous proceedings, and under this impression the opposers of the resolutions had been bold to call them trifling. In a commercial point of view, they are ill calculated, and were hazardous when peace was yet within our reach, but when a change of circumstances has given us a prospect of war, they are too trifling. He put a case. Would a farmer differ with his wife and daughters about the pedlar they should give a preference to, in purchasing their gaw-gaws; whether they would employ the English, Scotch, or Irish pedlar, when one of them was stealing the sheep, and wantonly sporting with the property on the farm? No, certainly, they would unite, and drive the thief off. It is just as ridiculous in the Legislature to be now spending their time about commercial regulations. More energetic measures are necessary. How is an additional ten per cent. on importations capable of opposing the torrent of British injustice? Let all intercourse with Great Britain be stopped, until they give us satisfaction for the injuries they have done us. This would be exhibiting a temporary enmity for a temporary evil; but the adoption of the resolutions would evince an eternal enmity, and at the same time want the energy which the urgency of the case would require.

Mr. PARKER rose to set the gentleman last up right as to one assertion. He said that the friends of the resolutions were opposed to every energetic measure which had been proposed. This was not the case; indeed, unless himself and several other members, friends to the resolutions, had voted for some of those more energetic measures, they would have failed.

Mr. MURRAY thought he confined his observations to a majority of the friends of the resolutions.

tions to a majority of the friends of the resolutions.

Mr. PARKER believed the resolutions would be beneficial to his country, and tend to encourage our manufactures. Under this impression, he was in favor of them. He wished all party distinctions dropped at the present critical juncture. He did not like to hear of these gentlemen and those gentlemen; let us unite as one. A member from Massachusetts conceived the resolutions bore the stamp of French on the very face of them. He wished, for his part, that every body and every thing could be plainly read by some such device, we should then see what and who is French, and who is English. He should not, he hoped, let prejudice get the better of his reason, but thought that he never could forget that, probably, without France the Legislature would not be now deliberating within these walls.

Mr. SEDEWICK said, that although he had been absent during the discussion of this important subject, yet he could not consent to give a silent vote, though he had not the vanity to suppose he could give new light; yet, having on a question of magnitude accustomed himself to speak as well as vote his sentiments, he would not now omit it; he felt the propriety of apologizing on this occasion. It was said that the measure was popular, and that the opposition was reprobated by the people; if so, it would be mean and base in him to shrink from a participation with the gentlemen, with whom he had so long acted, with perfect satisfaction to his own mind.

The question was now presented, as doubtless it ought to be, directed only to Great Britain, and proposing a discrimination against her. The object was to compel that country to relax the severity of her commercial regulations, and to put her intercourse with this country, on a more favorable footing to us. That all this was to be effected by lessening our trade with Great Britain, and diverting it to other channels.

When to all this it was replied, that the present conduct of Great Britain put such regulations at defiance; that so far from showing a dread of such a system, she was pursuing measures, which as far as in her power, threatened our commerce with annihilation; that at such a time to attempt by the proposed measures, to bend her views to our wishes was absurd. That at this time, if there was a ray of hope to avoid the calamities of war, every measure which was at the same time irritating and ineffectual should be avoided. To these objections it was answered, was war inevitable, the proposition ought now to be adopted, as a commercial system to come into operation at the conclusion of the war. Gentlemen who made this answer, did not seem to remember that to render it just, we must possess a certain knowledge of the events of the war. That the relative circumstances of the two countries might be mutually altered by those events, and that which might be proper now, would be wholly improper then.

As this question was merely of a commercial nature, he had regretted to see political considerations intermingled in the debate. The antipathy that was manifested to one country, and the friendly regard to another ought not to influence the decision. Passion should be banished, and just and cool calculations, on the foundation of national interest alone direct our determination.

It was not now a question, whether Great Britain had inflicted political injuries on this country, whether she aided the savages of the wilderness in the murder of our citizens, whether she had let loose upon us the more barbarous savages of Africa, or whether she had committed piratical depredations on our commerce; if these facts were so, and justice could not be obtained by negotiation, though he should deprecate war as an evil of great magnitude, yet should justice be denied us, he should then seek redress with as much firmness he hoped as most men. In such a warfare, he should hope for victory; there was he believed no foundation for such hope in the warfare contemplated by the propositions before the Committee.

He laid it down as a maxim that the Government of every country in all its deliberations should be influenced only by considerations of public good. To do justice to all the world, religiously to perform its contracts, these were to be scrupulously observed, for they were always for the public good. A private man might indeed, practise disinterested benevolence to any extent his humanity and generosity might dictate; a public man had no such authority. Did America, he asked, owe a debt of gratitude to France, whence she derived the authority to discharge it? Is such debt due, who shall calculate the amount? How much of the blood, of the treasure, of the prosperity of our country, will ease us of this load of obligation?

He said he did not wish to depreciate the merit of France; her efforts were glorious to herself, and beneficial to this country. That he might, however, be permitted to recal the remembrance of the Committee to her conduct, he then exhibited a view of that conduct, from which he concluded that every thing which was done, had its foundation in a cool and temperate calculation of national benefit. That this, indeed, was the only legitimate motive to national measures. That other countries could always calculate their measures upon national interest, and he sincerely hoped the Government of this country would do the same. To do otherwise, said he, is Quixotism—it is crusading for the salvation of others, and not ourselves. He hoped therefore that no part of our assent to the proposition immediately under consideration, would be expected either from gratitude on the one hand or resentment on the other.

He said, he should proceed to consider whether it was for the interest of America that this proposition should be adopted. The objects are to lessen credit, to control commerce by diverting it from its ancient channels, to encourage navigation and manufactures; and the motive was, that Great Britain possessed a greater portion of our trade than she was entitled to from her disposition and conduct towards us.

He could not help premising that the features of the system were strongly marked with a disposition to control men in the economy of private life and in the management of their fortunes; why else not permit them to extend their credit when in their opinion it may be useful to them? Such measures, for such purposes, could only be justified on a pretence that our countrymen were deficient either in wisdom or in prudence. A pretence which, if not insolent, always had, and always would be found mischievous, because the great bulk of every community were more competent to the management of their own private concerns than the Government could pretend to be.

The whole system is directed towards Great Britain, and the object is declaredly coercion. The consequences must be either, first, that Great Britain would submit; second, that she would withdraw her capital and relinquish a commercial connexion with us; or third, that she would counteract our regulations by Legislative provisions.

Suppose Great Britain should be compelled to submission, it would not be imagined she would do it immediately; and, in the meantime, we must suffer much distress. It was true, he said, we had many other commercial connexions, but in these we did almost the whole of the carrying: none of the nations to whom we are thus allied having any considerable shipping to spare for our purposes; nor was there any probability that they would immediately, if at all, furnish us with any considerable supply. We must, therefore, depend on ourselves. In a country circumstanced as this was, it was to be expected there would always be a deficiency of commercial capital, because there were so many objects to which capital could be profitably applied. The object of the resolutions under consideration, was to divert capital from branches in which it was at present gainfully employed, to others. The branch was at present overstocked, yet a diversity must take place, for ships must be built or our produce could not go to market, but must perish on our hands. Manufactures, too, must be established, or our citizens could not be supplied with the necessaries and conveniences for which they now depended on other countries; and they must do without them until our navigation is sufficiently increased. What effects, he asked, were to be produced by a diversion, and that immediately, of one half of our commerce from its ancient and natural channels? Was there nothing to be feared for the preservation of the public credit which this commerce was to support? Nothing for the prosperity and happiness of our country? But what, he said, appeared almost farcical to him was, it was not intended to be permanent. Gentlemen said, Great Britain would not stand the shock; she must submit; the very scheme, then, supposed its continuance was to depend on the pleasure of the country against whom we were to declare commercial war. When our ships were built and our manufactures established, Great Britain would give over the contest. Then our ships might be laid up at our docks, and our manufacturing capitals replaced in those branches from which it was now to be instantly withdrawn; for, unless that country would be convinced that she should participate in our commerce, which would not be the case if we supplied ourselves, she would certainly never bumble herself before us.

Strange and absurd suppositions were made to lay the foundation on which to build this system. It was supposed that without any considerable distress of our citizens; without a shock to public credit; without shipping to export or import; and with a deficiency of commercial capital, we could divert, and that immediately, half of our commerce from its natural channels, while Great Britain must be ruined, or at least compelled to submission, by a diversion of a small portion of hers, although she had shipping to transport through the world, and more commercial capital than any nation on earth. Take care, sir, said he, I beseech you, that led astray by resentment, gratitude, or refined theory, the curse of modern times, you do not dissipate your goodly inheritance. Gentlemen had said, our constituents are improvident, that the extension of credit afforded the means of dissipation; let us destroy those means. Strange doctrine, said he, and unfounded as strange! We have no right to assume the character of their guardians in this respect. There are not, as has been justly stated by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Lee,] any means by which this can be justly done, but by giving stability to your Government, and enforcing a prompt and impartial execution of your laws, which indeed would rather extend than limit credit.

Was Great Britain to relinquish her commercial connexion with us, though to her it would be a misfortune, yet to us it would be a very unhappy event. Ever since he could remember, it had been the fashionable cant to exclaim against credit; yet under a system of credit, America had enjoyed unparalleled prosperity. That, in his opinion, experience was the only unerring director in political investigations.

The commercial intercourse between Great Britain and America would continue, should this system be adopted, or it would cease. In either case or in a mean between the two, the burdens created by it would fall principally if not wholly on our citizens. Should it continue, it would be a charge on our imports and exports to be satisfied by the labor and industry of our people. On our exports, because in all foreign markets the products of our country have to sustain a competition with the same species of the products of other countries. A hog'shead of tobacco, for instance, has its price determined by the demand for it compared with the capacity of supplying that demand by this and other countries; an indemnification for the additional expense cannot be obtained in the sales; it must therefore be an expense in the labor and industry which produces the article. On our imports, the same will be the case, for a merchant will not continue to supply a market which will not indemnify him for all his expenses and besides afford him his usual profits. In this case also, there would be no other source of indemnification but the labor and industry of the country. Under the pressure of these burdens the reduced price of exports and the enhanced price of imports, how altered, from its present happy state, would be the condition of our planters and farmers! If the inter-course should not continue, then should we destroy our best markets, deprive our people of the most valuable source of supply, and destroy, too, the best means of supporting the public credit.

It remained, Mr. S. said, to be considered what effects would probably result from Great Britain meeting our regulations with countervailing restrictions. But, previous to an immediate consideration of this question, it would be proper to inquire whether the commercial conduct of that country towards this would justify this measure as a mean of retaliation?

He said, that he believed the conduct of Great Britain had, on this subject of commerce, been too limited and narrow. That this was particularly true as respected a commercial intercourse between America and Great Britain and her Dominions in the West Indies. But it should be remembered that she was an independent nation, and as such had a right to consult and pursue her own interest. That until she should be convinced that a more liberal and enlightened policy was for her benefit, it could not be expected that she would sacrifice her own interest to our benefit. That she would be at the expense of maintaining and supporting her Colonies, that we might participate in the profit. That all we could in reason demand of her was, that she should not discriminate against us, but that her conduct should be as favorable to us as to other independent nations. Was her conduct influenced by the considerations which have produced the resolution before us? Did she single out America as the only object of her resentment, the ardor with which this measure was pursued would have sufficient foundation for its justification.

Mr. S. then proceeded to state the regulations of Great Britain which directed her intercourse with this country. He said that respecting the West Indies, the same severe, rigid, and gloomy exclusion extended equally with us to all nations; with this only difference of partial and temporary relaxations in our favor, as, in her opinion, her occasions required. That, respecting an immediate intercourse with Great Britain, her regulations were as favorable to us as to any country, except only where favors are the effect of direct stipulation; nay, they are more so as respects the important articles of pot and pearl-ash, pitch, tar, timber, and an exemption from the payment of alien duties.

If, then, Great Britain did not discriminate against us—if her discriminations were favorable to us, where was our right for complaint? Should, however, unprovoked resentment (for gentlemen would remember to put political considerations out of the question) stimulate the adoption of the proposed measures, the disposition of that country to retaliate would be certain; her capacity for retaliation was therefore to be considered. This subject, he said, had been under the consideration of the British Government. Should she subject American ships to alien duties; should she impose duties on our rice and tobacco and such other articles as she can procure from other countries, and on her own products exported in our bottoms; and should she at the same time counteract our duties by bounties; their bounties may be so given as completely to balance our duties, and their duties, of course, a direct charge upon us—a charge on our exports, for the reasons he had already mentioned, depreciating their value—a charge on our imports to be satisfied by the labor and industry of the country. These would be the salutary effects of this blessed system, so far as the trade should continue under the load of these oppressive burdens. If the commercial intercourse between America and Great Britain should be destroyed by this system of expensive irritation, the evils were obvious, both as they would affect the ease and prosperity of our people, and the preservation of the public credit. He had called the present channels of commerce, the natural ones—there would, he said, be found sufficient reason for the appellation, without entering into an extensive investigation of the subject, in this one observation; that the present state of our trade is produced by counting-house calculations having interest alone for their object.

Commerce of the United States.

[H. or R.]

It had been said, that a great part of our imports consisted of the mere articles of luxury. This was undoubtedly true, but luxurious enjoyments could not be prevented, unless we would introduce the manners of Sparta, and continue them by the institutions and laws of Lycurgus. The passion for distinction could not be controlled nor would it be eligible, if it could. If, then, said he, we will use Madeira wine and green tea—if we will wear silks, cambrics, muslins, and other succedanea of the fig-leaf, why should we not be permitted to obtain them when they can best be had, of the best quality and on the best terms; or do gentlemen suppose our constituents will acknowledge obligation for being compelled to procure them of inferior quality and on worse terms?

Gentlemen had given countenance to this project under an idea that it would encourage manufactures and the carrying trade; this to his mind was preposterous. He had always supposed that to establish manufactures, our active capital must be increased; and to encourage navigation, our trade must be extended. How this measure which would lessen our active capital by the embarrassment it would create, could afford the means of establishing manufactures and building ships, to his mind was perfectly unaccountable. He asked if it had not been demonstrated that the measure would tend to enhance the price of the commodities which we wanted to purchase, and decrease the price of the products of our country. It had, indeed, been conceded, that these effects were unavoidable, and yet these were the means whereby we were to extend our manufactures and navigation. Should, however, these effects result, he asked if we could feel ourselves justified in sacrificing to the encouragement of a few ship-carpenters and other mechanics, the ease and comfort of that most useful and respectable description of men, the farmer and planter? One more observation he said he would make on this head, that any measure which might oppress the community, would be felt first and most severely by the poorer class of people.

Before the subject was dismissed it ought to be viewed in a light in which it was shown in the most baneful colors; its tendency to war and all its dreadful consequences. As the guardians of the public happiness, we ought to avoid any measure which tended to this, if it could be done consistent with the interest of our country. He laid it down as a principle that every action had its character determined by the motives which gave it birth. What motives then originated this measure? Were they of a commercial, or political nature? Had Great Britain inflicted any commercial injuries on this country? Had she not calculated her regulations on the same principle of all other nations—her own interest? Had she discriminated against us? Did not the details clearly show that her regulations were as favorable to this as to other countries? And did not an infinitely more stubborn fact, the existing state of our trade, undeniably prove here to be our best markets?

If, then, these measures are not justified on commercial considerations, will the nation towards whom they are directed, be at a loss to determine our true motives? If doubts could otherwise exist, recourse to the printed debates would remove it. There we find our negroes carried off; the Western posts, the savages, Algerines, and instructions to the commanders of ships, the constant theme of animated declamation. We know too well the correctness of gentlemen's understandings not to be assured that these subjects would not be so frequently repeated, if they were not designed to have effect. These were not commercial, but political considerations. If, then, the measure could not be—if it was not justified on commercial, but political ground—if it was not designed to retaliate for commercial, but for political injuries; if it followed irresistibly, that the measure assumed the complexion of hostility. He did not mean to suggest an idea but that the injuries complained of might justify hostile retaliation; but he would affirm, if this measure was designed as such, it was infinitely too feeble, and would certainly prove ineffectual. If war was really the intention, it was our duty boldly to declare it, and like men, prepare for the event and not involve our country in blood under the disguised pretence of our commercial regulations. If we found motives for our conduct in antipathy to one nation, and in gratitude and affection to another, and that this was the case, he appealed to the printed debates and to the faithful monitors of gentlemen—would it be supposed that Great Britain would not understand, resent, and endeavor to revenge it? Great Britain, he said, was involved in a war, whether just or not, the Government of this country had no right to determine—just or not, we had reason to believe it was popular. While she was pursuing this war, we complaining of injuries, and stimulated by a sense of them, adopt measures of retaliation, declaredly intended to produce embarrassments of such a nature as to induce her to change a course of conduct she has pursued for ages, and to which, in her opinion, she is principally indebted for her progressive prosperity. If serious embarrassments are not to be expected, then ought the measure to be abandoned, because it would not produce the intended effect, and because it would confessedly be injurious to us.

Commerce of the United States.

[MARCH, 1794.]

Should it produce the embarrassments foretold, it will materially affect those resources on which she depends for the prosecution of a favorite war. Should she feel those measures as intended, would it not kindle resentment? Would she not discover the cause? And would she not feel perfect self-justification in using all the means in her power to revenge our partiality?

The evil, he said, would not end here. Great Britain was an important ally, and on her resources the Combined Powers materially depended for the prosecution of the war. A war waged with as much enmity as had provoked hostility at any period of the existence of civilized Europe. Should we strike at those resources, and from motives they will doubtless comprehend, would they tamely submit to such conduct? would they not resent and endeavor to revenge it? I will repeat, said he, that if your measures do not materially embarrass Great Britain, and in a considerable degree destroy her resources, then will your expectations be disappointed, and the end you propose defeated, and you only accumulate distress on your own citizens. If the embarrassments you intend shall result from your measures, then do you, in fact, take part in the war; you will, therefore, provoke the vengeance of the nation against whom your measures are directed, and of her allies.

To show the natural effects of commercial regulations pointed against nations to produce hostility, he mentioned the war which took place between Great Britain and Holland, in 1652, occasioned by the Navigation Act of the former; and that of 1672, between the French and Dutch, in consequence of the duties imposed by the former on linen, and by the latter on wine. There was, he said, peculiar reason for expecting such an event in the present instance, for, by the treaty between Great Britain and Spain, it was expressly stipulated: "if either shall be attacked, molested, or inquieted, in any of their States, rights, possessions, or interests," it is then to be made common cause.

This, he said, was not all, our real views would be known to our constituents. They are, said he, a wise and penetrating people, and will never consent to be dragged to the carnage of war, under a pretence of commercial regulations. Their honest candor will abhor and detest all covert and crooked politics. He did not mean to charge gentlemen with unworthy motives. He could not, however, avoid declaring the comment which in his opinion would be made, on experience of the fatal events which would result from the adoption of the proposed system—a system incapable of benefit to the community and pregnant with enormous evils.

He said, before he dismissed this part of the nations by those of our own; to repel their fabrics and manufactures from our country, and to replace them with our own. We have both the right and the power to do it. These are truths that have been always acknowledged in this country. Conviction of their importance was one among the causes which produced the present Constitution. We have hitherto forborne the exercise of this right. I do not pretend to arraign the motives, I believe they were good; because, sir, I recollect that our commerce and navigation for past years hath been prosperous, although owing, perhaps, less to permanent than adventitious causes; to the same causes, possibly, which now conspire to oppress and despoil it, and threaten its total dissolution. Was this not the case, I could have been content, nay, I would have preferred still further forbearance; but the evils are alarming; something is unavoidably necessary to be done; and, as no gentleman proposes any substitute for the present system contemplated, I find myself compelled to endeavor to make the best of this, with a firm reliance and persuasion that it will promote the peace and prosperity of our country; for I do not think anything we shall do will have a tendency to make Great Britain less hostile or more friendly. She has already convinced us that we cannot expect anything from her moderation and justice; and I hope we shall have nothing further to fear from her force. I hope and believe this measure will attach and increase the number of our friends, and diminish and confound our enemies; for I can by no means subscribe to the doctrine, that a national character is wholly abstracted from all sensation of benevolence, gratitude, humanity—virtues that so highly adorn individual character. These, sir, are my impressions—the result of a cautious and even anxious investigation, in which I have endeavored not to be transported by either passion or prejudice, but to obey the calm dictates of my understanding, with that independence and steadiness which is indispensable.

Mr. AMES began with remarking that the additional duties were intended, he believed, to operate generally, and that their operation would fall on the middling classes of the people. But the resolution would also affect our exports, and, in this view, injure our cutters of timber, makers of potash, and farmers in general would feel their operation deeply—all this for the advantage of our ship-owners. If the resolutions cannot now be termed trifling, then, indeed, he had mistaken their true character. In a moment of danger, when our commerce is nearly annihilated, it is trifling to talk of regulating it, when we should attend to our defence only. When brought forward they had an alarming appearance—negotiations were pending. We should always say peace to the last extremity; and, if war threatens, strain every sinew to prepare for it. The resolutions say nothing—they say worse than nothing; they are built on partiality for one nation—they have French stamped on the very face of them. If we feel that the English have injured us, let us put the country in a state of defence; the resolutions can do nothing towards this. It is folly to think of regulating a commerce that calls first for protection, and to encourage the increase of navigation when what shipping we have is in jeopardy. At this stage, the Committee rose and had leave to sit again.

CLEARING THE GALLERIES.

Resolved, That it be a Standing Rule and Order of this House, in case of any disturbance or disorderly conduct in the Gallery or Lobby, that the SPEAKER, (or Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House) shall have power to order the same to be cleared.

Walley and others; of McClellan, McGregor & Co.; of John Amelung and others; of Josiah G. Pierson; of the manufacturers of hats in the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Virginia; and of Bradley & Mix, made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill entitled "An act making further provision for the expenses attending the intercourse of the United States with foreign nations, and further to continue in force the act, entitled 'An act providing the means of intercourse between the United States and foreign nations,' with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment; and, the same being read, was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the state of the Union under consideration, but came to no resolution thereupon.

TUESDAY, March 18.

An engrossed bill to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes, was read the third time and passed.

A memorial of Levi Hollingsworth and others, proprietors of iron works in the State of Pennsylvania, was presented to the House and read, praying that the present duty imposed by law on the importation of bar and cast iron, from foreign countries, may be continued, or such encouragement given to the erecting and improving furnaces and forges for manufacturing the said article within the United States as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet. Ordered to lie.

On motion, it was Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized to employ, as dispatch boats, such of the revenue cutters of the United States as the public exigencies may require.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic having requested an advance of money, I transmit to Congress certain documents relative to that subject.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 18, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to be committed to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. AMES, Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. VENABLE, and Mr. SHERBURNE.

An engrossed bill to provide for placing buoys on certain rocks off the Harbor of New London, and in Providence river, was read the third time and passed.

A memorial of sundry inhabitants of the town of Salem, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will adopt such measures as, in their wisdom, may be deemed the most expedient and effectual to obtain redress for the vexations and spoliations committed on the commerce of the United States by the subjects of Great Britain, under the authority of that Government, as well by the subjects and citizens of other foreign countries. Also, a memorial of sundry citizens of the State of South Carolina, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said memorials be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CONA, from the committee appointed to report whether any, and what alterations are, in their opinion, necessary to the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States," made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the state of the Union under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That measures ought to be immediately taken to render the force of the United States more efficient.

Ordered, That the said resolution be committed to Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. DAVIES, Mr. JAYNE, Mr. MERCER, Mr. PARKER, Mr. LOCKE, and Mr. PICKENS.

A motion being made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That a select corps of militia be enrolled in the United States; that all freemen capable of bearing arms, from the age of — to —, compose a select militia; and that they be armed and accoutred at the general expense.

"Resolved, That the several States shall officer the militia now commissioned, or such other persons as they may think proper.

"Resolved, That the said select militia be called together as often as may be directed by the Legislatures of the several States, not exceeding — days in one year; and, for the time they are so called out, they shall receive the same pay and rations as the troops of the United States.

"Resolved, That, in case of invasion or insurrection, the President of the United States shall have the power to call into actual service such portion or portions of the select militia as may be deemed necessary for the common defence.

"Resolved, That no select militia man shall be called into actual service for more than one year."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to the committee last appointed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill transferring, for a limited time, the jurisdiction of suits and offences from the District to the Circuit Court of New Hampshire, and assigning certain duties in respect to invalid pensions to the Attorney of the said District; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. JAYNE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to encourage the recruiting service; which was twice read, and committed.

TUESDAY, March 25.

An engrossed bill transferring, for a limited time, the jurisdiction of suits and offences from the District to the Circuit Court of New Hampshire, and assigning certain duties in respect to invalid pensions, to the Attorney of the said District, was read the third time, and passed.

A memorial of sundry merchants in the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in the State of Virginia, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying an extension of the term of credit allowed by law for the payment of the duties imposed on articles the growth or manufacture of the West India Islands, imported into the United States.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the committee appointed to report whether any, and what, alterations or amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That the petitions of Thomas Garney and others, fishermen, employed in the fishing trade in the town of Marblehead, in the State of Massachusetts; and of William Knight and others, owners of fishing vessels, employed in the said town of Marblehead, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. LYMAN, Mr. WINGATE, and Mr. HOLLIS; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The two Letters which I now forward to Congress, were written by a Consul of the United States, and contain information which will probably be thought to require some pecuniary provision.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, March 25, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. LEE, Mr. KIRKPA, and Mr. PAGE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the conference desired by this House, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes;" and have appointed managers at the said conference on their part. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in certain cases, to alter the place for holding a session of Congress."

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That provision be made by law to prohibit, for a term not exceeding — days, all trade from the United States to the American Territories, or dependencies of any European nation.

"To prohibit, for a like term, the exportation of all articles, the growth or product of the West Indies, out of the United States; and to provide that no ship or vessel be cleared out from any port or district within the United States, till bonds, with sufficient surety, be given to the proper officer of the Customs, in a sum equal to the whole value of the cargo on board such ship or vessel, conditioned that the same shall not be landed at any of the places prohibited by law; and that certificates of the landing at some other place be produced in a given time.

"That the President of the United States be authorized to take off the said prohibitions, if the Legislature shall not be in session; and that he be further authorized, at any time during their next recess, to lay an embargo on the ships or vessels of the United States, or on any foreign ships or vessels in the ports or harbors of the United States, or both; and to prohibit the exportation of any of the products of the United States, or of any other goods, wares, or merchandise, to such Kingdom or Country as he may judge necessary: Provided, That such embargo shall not continue for a longer term than — at any one time."

Ordered, That the said resolution be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House, accordingly, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the said resolution; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said resolution under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

And then the said resolution, being further amended at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That an embargo be laid on all ships and vessels in the ports of the United States bound to any foreign port or place, for the term of thirty days, and that no clearances be furnished during that time to any ship or vessel bound to such foreign port or place, except ships or vessels under the immediate directions of the President of the United States; and that the President of the United States be authorized to give such instructions to the Revenue Officers of the United States, as shall appear best adapted for carrying the said resolution into full effect."

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report a state of facts, with their opinion thereupon, relative to a settlement made by the State of North Carolina, for certain claims against the United States, and paid by her to individuals of that State, which it is suggested would have been allowed under the act of the twenty-seventh of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, entitled "An act providing for the settlement of the claims of persons under particular circumstances, barred by the limitations heretofore established," if they had been presented by the individuals themselves.

Ordered, That Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. BLOUNT, and Mr. IRVING, be a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

WEDNESDAY, March 26.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in certain cases, to alter the place of holding a session of Congress," was read twice, and committed to a committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The said bill was then read the third time and passed.

Mr. TACOT, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States, reported an amendatory bill; which was twice read, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House for laying an embargo on all ships or vessels in the ports of the United States, bound to any foreign port or place, for the term of thirty days, with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and the same being read, was agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. LEE, from the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States, of the twenty-fifth instant, enclosing two Letters from Fulwar Skipwith, Consul of the United States at Martinique, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for continuing and regulating embargoes in the United States, and that Mr. DEXTER, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. GOODRICH, be the said committee.

Mr. HEATH, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what amendments are, in their opinion, necessary to the act, entitled "An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental Establishment, to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Scioto," made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of fifteen members, be appointed to inquire whether any, or what, further or other revenues are necessary for the support of public credit; and if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means:

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. WIL-advantages which could be derived from any of his Reports to this House, as to systems of finance, or of Ways and Means; indeed, those of the former which we have adopted, were unnecessarily complicated, and by no means adapted to the genius and interest of our infant Republic; and, perhaps, some of the latter were as exceptionable. When applied to, at the last session, for the means of raising about forty thousand dollars, the Secretary reported, that it was necessary to lay a tax of one dollar on every wheel of certain carriages, and the same tax on certain horses; and extraordinary as this proposition was, but for a circumstance which interrupted the subject, it was in a fair way of being pressed upon the House, instead of recommending an additional tonnage, or a sale of lands belonging to the United States—a sure and adequate resource—the most obvious means of raising, not only that sum, but almost any sum we can want. The Secretary resorted, to the astonishment of many of our constituents, to the strange means just mentioned. Sir, I think that, without the Secretary's assistance, the committee may, in a single day, devise the necessary ways and means. But, if that all-wise, only skillful financier, must be resorted to, let us call for his aid, let us receive his report here, and not say, that it is from a spirit of accommodation, now proposed, that our committee shall call for one, and lay it before this House—for this mode of introducing a report, of such a nature, surely cannot be called accommodating it to the wishes of those who object to such reports, when unaided by the influence and weight of a committee.]

THURSDAY, March 27.

A memorial of sundry merchants, mariners, and others, citizens of the towns of Norfolk and Portsmouth, of the county of Norfolk, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress will adopt such measures as, in their wisdom, may be deemed most expedient and effectual to obtain redress for the vexations and spoiliations committed on the commerce of the United States, by the subjects of Great Britain, under the authority of that Government, and by the citizens and subjects of other foreign countries.

Ordered, That the said memorial be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. HARTLEY, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes," made a report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That, instead of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the first section of the said bill, the said first section be amended, by striking out from the word "stores," in the second line, to the word "Provided," in the eighth line, and inserting, in lieu thereof, the words following, to wit: "There shall be established, under the direction of the President of the United States, three or four arsenals, with magazines, as he shall judge most expedient, in such places as will best accommodate the different parts of the United States; either or both of the arsenals heretofore used at Springfield and Carlisle to be continued as part of the said number, at his discretion."

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the amendments to the third and sixth sections of the said bill.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to all the other amendments to the said bill.

NATIONAL DEFENCE.

Mr. SENWICK, from the committee to whom it was referred to report the means of rendering the force of the United States more efficient, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

The report is as follows:

The Committee to whom it was referred to report the means of rendering the force of the United States more efficient, after mature and deliberate consideration, have unanimously agreed to report to the House the following resolutions as proper to be adopted:

1. Resolved, That effectual measures ought to be adopted to complete the present Military Establishment of the United States, and that provision ought to be made that the same may be kept full.

2. Resolved, That an additional corps of artillery, not to exceed eight hundred men, officers included, and also including one Chief and four Assistant Engineers, ought to be raised, for garrisoning the fortifications which are, or may be, erected for the defence of the sea coast.

3. Resolved, That the President be authorized and empowered to call on the Executives of the several States to take effectual measures, as soon as may be, to organize and hold in readiness to march, at a moment's warning, eighty thousand effective Militia, (officers included,) to be apportioned to the States, respectively, in proportion to the whole number of white inhabitants, that is to say—

Georgia	1,333
South Carolina	2,550
North Carolina	7,331
Kentucky	1,532
Virginia	11,377
Maryland	5,418
Delaware	1,266
Pennsylvania	10,768
New Jersey	4,318
New York	7,971
Vermont	2,129
Connecticut	6,881
Rhode Island	1,697
Massachusetts	11,885
New Hampshire	3,544
Total	80,000

Which detachment of Militia shall be officered out of the present Militia officers, or others, at the option and discretion of the Constitutional authority of the States, respectively.

4. Resolved, That any independent corps of cavalry, artillery, or infantry, may be accepted as part of the said detachment of militia, provided they shall voluntarily engage, and provided the same shall be deemed eligible by the President.

5. Resolved, That the President be desired to request the Executives of the several States to take effectual care that the men detached as aforesaid be armed and equipped according to law.

6. Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for organizing and raising a military force, under the authority of the Government of the United States, to consist of — rank and file, with the proper officers, to serve for the term of — years, or during a war which may break out between the United States and any foreign European Power; and that the President be authorized to take the measures necessary for raising the same: Provided, That no such measures be taken by the Executive until war shall be actually commenced between the United States and some foreign European Power.

SEQUESTRATION OF BRITISH DEBTS.

Mr. DARROW submitted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for the sequestration of all the debts due from the citizens of the United States to the subjects of the King of Great Britain.

"Resolved, That provision ought, in like manner, to be made for securing the payment of all such debts into the Treasury of the United States, there to be held as a pledge for the indemnification of such of the citizens of the said States as shall have suffered from the ships of war, privateers, or from any person, or description of persons, acting under the commission or authority of the British King, in contravention of the Law of Nations, and in violation of the rights of neutrality.

Ordered, That the said resolutions be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into said Committee.

Mr. DARROW then rose in support of his propositions. When he brought them forward he did not accompany them, (he said,) with many observations, because he was then laboring under indisposition. The same cause would render him very concise now.

The injuries and insults we have suffered from Great Britain, he conceived, need not be dwelt upon. They are well known, and it is universally acknowledged that we ought to adopt such measures as would screen us from a repetition of them, and secure to us reparation. The resolutions he had brought forward he intended as part of that system of defence and preservation, other portions of which had already received the sanction of the House. These resolutions, he conceived, would not be the least efficient part of that system.

He believed that, when the conduct of Great Britain is reviewed, it would be found that it is treating their subjects with great lenity to speak of sequestration only; we should be warranted in confiscating, for they have subjected our property to condemnation, without an appearance of an intention to indemnify.

As to restitution of the property of which we have been plundered on the high seas, it is impossible. It is condemned, sold, and scattered, and no hope can be entertained that they intend to indemnify our suffering citizens. If it had been their intention to indemnify, their Court, in explanation of the instruction of the 6th of November, would not have given orders to condemn vessels detained in suspense in the West Indies until that elucidation was received.

Since, then, restitution is impossible, and not a shadow of hope exists that indemnification will be granted: we have only to determine whether we shall give up the property of which we have been plundered, or claim it with effect—claim it, and enforce the claim, by showing that we have the means of retaliation within our power.

After the proceedings of the British towards us, he believed, we should have been warranted in confiscating the property now proposed to be sequestered, without negotiation. This would have been meeting to them as they meted to us. If sequestration is hostility, as he had heard it called, what, he asked, is condemnation? Besides, they have impressed American citizens into their service. We have reason to believe, (he concluded by remarking,) from the negotiation of our Minister with Lord Grenville, from private information on the tables of Congress, and from the conduct of some of their officers high in command, that to make war on us is part of their system.

Mr. S. SMITH said he always had wished for peace, as the first desideratum. With this view, agreeably to the wise recommendation of the President, he agreed to those measures calculated to put the country in a posture of defence. This was the best mode of securing peace. With the same view, he proposed an embargo to be laid, which would have drawn to our ports the remainder of our maritime possessions, and have left them no longer within the grasp of a nation whose only rule of right is the measure of her power. He still wished, as long as a shadow of hope exists, to secure the blessings of peace. With the resolutions now offered, he was of opinion that we might yet have peace; but, without them, we shall certainly have war. They will arrest twenty millions of dollars in our hands, as a fund to reimburse the three or four millions which we have been stripped of by that piratical nation, Great Britain, according to the instructions of that King of Sea Robbers—that Leviathan, which aims at swallowing all that floats on the ocean—that monster, whose only law is power, and who neither respects the rights of nations nor the property of individuals! This character the nation he had mentioned had long deserved. Many proofs might be cited in support of the assertion. He would only refer to their conduct at St. Eustatius, when they robbed their allies, the Dutch, and their Generals and Admirals turned vendue-masters, and conducted the plundering, to collect rewards for their exploits. Is it from such a nation (he asked) that we are to hope for justice? They know not what justice is. It is said that they showed their love of justice when they so liberally compensated the Tories after their war with us. Though they despise traitors, yet self-interest will lead them to reward the treachery, to encourage a principle which may again be useful to them. Self-interest, then, and not justice, actuated them on that as on every other occasion.

Let us pass the resolutions, then send an Envoy to Great Britain, and we shall have peace. We shall then be able to speak to them of their interest. But if war should be the inevitable issue, Americans, he was sure, would meet it like men, rather than submit to insult and suffer the honor of the country to be prostrated.

If we were able, while in infancy as a nation, to assert our rights, will it be said, that now we have arrived at a state of manhood, we shall fear them? No! Our young men burn for an opportunity to defend the liberty, rights, and property of their country. They will step out as one, and meet the event like men.

He read a quotation from Vattel, to show that a nation has a right to pay her citizens for losses inflicted by another nation, contrary to right, by confiscating the property belonging to the citizens of that nation. The tie of interest, he concluded by remarking, is the strongest tie we have upon Great Britain. Let us pass the resolutions, and that nation will never again give us cause to pass similar ones. The people out of doors will say that we have done right. The nations of Europe will rejoice to see this Power, which is committing depredations on all nations humbled. The resolutions, he observed, do not regard the property in the funds. To touch this is not one of the means of retaliation warranted by the Law of Nations. Public contracts should be sacred.

Mr. BOWDISH said, he had not intended to take part in the debate at this early stage of it; but what had fallen from the member last up, convinced him that the House should not go into a consideration of the subject at this time. It should be considered with coolness, and all passions put out of the question.

No doubt we have a right to make reprisals, as the Legislature has a right to declare war; but he doubted whether the United States, in their present situation, would find it their interest to go into such measures. The authority read from Vattel by the member last up, he observed, made against that member's opinion. Vattel expressly says that reprisals should not be made on property intrusted to public faith. The debts of British subjects here are in that predicament. He had heard that gentleman, not long since, with pleasure, expatiate with warmth on the advantages of credit, especially to this country. Should that credit be destroyed, (he asked,) by destroying the confidence of foreigners in our faith? But, even if this retaliation is lawful, will it be the interest of the citizens, or rather of the Government, to take such a step at the present time? We have no doubt been cruelly treated; but have we made proper application for redress, and received an answer? We should first send a special Envoy and insist on an immediate answer. This would be the mode of securing peace; at least, it offers the best chance of securing it.

The aggressions on our commerce made by Great Britain are no doubt enough to rouse any American's feelings; but the Legislature ought not to be swayed by passions; they should discuss the subject calmly and deliberately. He hoped the Committee would rise and allow time, at least, to take the necessary measures of defence; for, could the Legislature justify to their constituents this step of retaliation, should immediate hostilities, warlike hostilities, be the consequence? To justify a measure of this kind time should be given for the defensive system adopted to be carried into operation.

Mr. MAZEAU next spoke. He owned the measures proposed appeared to him great and momentous, and, had he any powers of declamation, he should think it improper to give loose to them on a question of this kind. We should weigh well our interest, examine carefully the situation in which we stand, and determine calmly where we shall place our next step. The proposition is to arrest, not to confiscate, the debts due to British subjects. From his recollection of the positions established by the best jurisprudence writers, no doubt remained in his mind that we have a clear right to secure to ourselves reparation in that way, and, in our predicament, confiscation even would be warranted, and by a point as firmly established as any principle which has the general practice of nations for a basis.

One of the latest writers on National Law, (Binkerschoek) is of opinion that debts are property, as well as anything else, and sees no reason why they should not, as well as other kinds of property, be seized to secure indemnity for injuries. This is the opinion of Wolffius, of Vattel, Grotius, and of his commentators. He could go on with a long list of authorities, and refer to actual treaties to show that it has been the practice of nations. Having established the right, he proceeded to consider the expediency of the proposition. Gentlemen, he hoped, did not wish that we should make a solemn declaration of war before we acted. This is no longer the custom among nations. It would be a pompous display of candor which no longer exists. Has any nation in the present European war, premised their operations by a declaration? No; their first step was to do all the injury in their power to their enemies. Then, we having taken what steps will best tend to our security, and give us the best hold of our enemy, let us not, however, lose sight of a settlement by negotiation. Let us show mankind that peace is our first wish. When we are thus prepared, let us step forward to an amicable negotiation. Let us call on the Executive to send forth some proper person to the Court of Great Britain, to assure them that we have a high sense of the injury done us; that we have it in our power to resent it, but wish to see the difference settled by receiving an indemnification. We shall thus make it their interest as well as duty to allow it. This he conceived to be the line of conduct we should adopt, if we wished to preserve the Western Hemisphere from the scourges that desolate the Old World. By some such measure as that proposed, we should make their motives for peace more weighty, and we should give assurances of our amicable disposition, by showing that all we wish is a just compensation.

In a matter of this kind, he was sensible of the danger of precipitation. The best mode of arresting the property proposed should be calmly weighed. He believed that something like the proposition made by Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, before the House resolved itself into a Committee—a stop to all transfers of British property—would be proper as a preliminary step.

He concluded with some observations on the respect which nations, however weak, will command from their superiors in strength, by showing that they will not suffer imposition, by joining heart and hand in defence of their rights. This spirit, he was sure, animates Americans, and now their power is better able to keep pace with that spirit than when we humbled that nation. At that time we were in our infancy—an infancy by no means thriving under the trammels of the mother country—and, when they turned us adrift, and began their hostile spoiliations, they carried with them all our means of defence; but now, thank Providence, we have spirit and power to defend ourselves. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Smith] would modify his proposition, and make the term thirty days, it should have his assent in preference to that now before the Committee.

Mr. Smith, of South Carolina, said, that the proposition he had read before the House went into Committee was in the nature of an embargo on debts, securing them from transfer until the necessities of sequestering them more plainly appeared. The proposition did not then appear to meet the wishes of the House. When the Committee should rise he would again bring it forward. The question now before the Committee is whether they will agree to a sequestration of British debts. He wished this object had not been coupled with the indemnification to our own citizens, because it is fairer to decide each question upon its own merits. That part of the resolutions which contemplates an indemnification may give a weight to the first part which it might not intrinsically deserve.

He made some observations on the propriety of cool deliberation on the present important subject. The passions should be banished, and calm reason more than ever courted. It requires all the wisdom of the Legislative body now to combine our national honour with our national safety. He had doubts on the propriety of the resolutions proposed, but acknowledged that the arguments used in their favor had great weight in his mind. If the situation of this country be compared with that of other commercial nations, the propriety of something like the present resolutions would appear more evident. When other commercial nations wish to quarrel with us, their navies enable them to seize our vessels, and we cannot retaliate in the same way. Then we must fly to such means of retaliation as are in our power. If they take our property of one description, and we cannot lay our hands upon the same kind, we must take any of theirs within our reach. This reasoning has, no doubt, great force; but the sacredness with which the modern usages of nations has shielded debts, is a great bar to our proceeding in the present case. Contracts between individuals are now considered as out of the reach of Governments, and it is the modern usage not to meddle with them. In the beginning of our late war, debts were not confiscated. The State of South Carolina, though certainly not wanting provocation, while confiscating all other property, left debts untouched, under the idea that private contracts are sacred. But this, in a case of war, and urgent necessity, might be overlooked; but if we are not in a state of war, perhaps meddling with private contracts might provoke it. Credit is certainly important to this country. We should consider how far the operation of the resolutions proposed would give a shock to it. Besides, they might have a tendency to involve us in future wars. We shall yet long be under the necessity of receiving certain supplies from Europe, and shall have debtors among us for those supplies. These debtors may at any time, when the burden weighs heavy, think of easing it by fomenting dissensions with the foreign creditor nation, in expectation that a confiscation of the debts may be an effect. It is true that, in such a case, they will not be exonerated. But it cannot be supposed that the Government to whom the debts would be transferred could prosecute the recovery of them with as much ardor as an individual.

The gentleman last up had relied on the authority of ancient and modern jurists. Some among this class of writers warrant putting prisoners to death—a principle which modern custom has put a stop to. They also, it is true, warrant the confiscation of debts; but Bartolamæus says this is not the practice of modern nations. None, or very few trifling examples can be cited, he believed, of a departure from this principle, in modern times, among nations where commerce is cherished. This country depends on commerce, and credit is one of the means by which it flourishes; we should, then, not endeavor to weaken it. If we are once over the barrier, by trifling extensions of the principle, we may be carried to immoderate lengths indeed. Some persons who are in favor of sequestering private debts, speak with horror of touching the public funds. For his part, he did not see much difference between confiscating private and public debts. The object is the injury of an enemy, and to retaliate for injuries. Again: if we go to war with Great Britain, it is probable we shall be involved with her allies, then will it be said, that we shall confiscate what the Dutch lent us at a time of distress or since the peace. The Dutch have bought largely in our funds. The same principle will lead us to lay our hands upon that property. It will be difficult to draw a line, if we admit the principle.

Under these impressions, if called upon to give his vote, he should now feel much embarrassment. It had been said that the adoption of the present resolutions would be a means of obliging Great Britain to do us justice; that it would strike a terror among the subjects of that country, and make them clamorous for peace. It might, he feared, have a very different effect, exasperate them, and unite the people with the Government against us. Some further forbearance on our part may separate them. It will convince the people of Great Britain that we really wish for peace, and then, if war is the issue, the impression will be severely felt by that Government. We shall render the Administration very unpopular, and hasten its dissolution for one more friendly to this country. He was of opinion this crisis was fast approaching.

He concluded by again adverting to his propositions for preventing the transfer of British debts, which he hoped would be considered as a sufficient provision in the present exigency, and would give time to deliberate on further measures, and to watch the course of events in Europe, which, he believed, would have great influence upon the conduct of Great Britain towards us, and probably bring forward the change in the Administration of Great Britain.

The Committee now rose and reported progress.

FRIDAY, March 28.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions."

Whereupon,
Ordered, That the said amendments be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the amendment proposed by this House in lieu of the amendments of the Senate to the first section of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes." An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes. The Senate recede from their amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the sixth section, and insist on their amendment, disagreed to by this House, to the third section of the said bill.

The House proceeded to reconsider the amendment of the Senate, disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the third section of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their disagreement to the said amendment.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

In the execution of the resolution of Congress, bearing date the twenty-sixth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, and imposing an embargo, I have requested the Governors of the several States to call forth the force of their Militia, if it should be necessary, for the detention of vessels. This power is conceived to be incidental to an embargo.

It also deserves the attention of Congress how far the clearances from one district to another, under the law as it now stands, may give rise to evasions of the embargo. As one security, the Collectors have been instructed to refuse to receive the surrender of coasting licenses, for the purpose of taking out registers, and to require bond from registered vessels, bound from one district to another, for the delivery of the cargo within the United States.

It is not understood that the resolution applies to fishing vessels, although their occupations lie, generally, in parts beyond the United States. But, without further restrictions, there is an opportunity of their privileges being used as means of eluding the embargo.

All armed vessels, possessing public commissions from any foreign Power, (letters of marque excepted,) are considered as not liable to the embargo.

These circumstances are transmitted to Congress for their consideration.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 28, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and committed to Mr. DEXTER, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. GOODHUE.

SEQUESTRATION OF BRITISH DEBTS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and took up Mr. DAYTON's resolutions for the sequestration of debts due to British subjects.

Mr. GILES commenced his remarks by observing that he had intended to have given a silent vote upon this question before the Committee, and probably should not have altered that intention, if it had not been from the solicitous requests expressed yesterday by several gentlemen in the opposition that the favorers of the proposed measure should furnish the Committee with the reasons upon which it was founded. Although it appeared to him to be rather unreasonable that some gentlemen should be expected, not only to possess reasons for their own opinions, but to furnish reasons for others; and, although he did not conceive that the favorers of the measure were under any obligation to disclose the reasons inducing it, provided they thought proper to hazard its fate upon a silent vote, yet he was willing to indulge the gentlemen with presenting to them the general course of reflection which the subject had produced in his mind, and which had strongly suggested its propriety. He had, however, a more powerful inducement to disclosing his opinion, since the subject has become matter of discussion and its propriety doubted.

The measure is deemed a bold one, and pregnant with the most serious consequences; in all such cases, he was desirous that his responsibility to the United States in general, and to his immediate constituents in particular, would at all times be tested by the real motives which should influence his conduct.

Several gentlemen in the opposition had earnestly admonished the Committee against the indulgence of their passions upon this subject, and recommended the exercise of cool and deliberate reasoning. He should not pretend to say how far such an admonition was necessary, or justified by the temper of the Committee, but he believed it applied as strongly to the gentlemen who suggested the caution, as to those to whom it was addressed; and he hoped in the course of the future discussion, the gentlemen would show an example in themselves of the precepts they had prescribed to others.

As to himself, Mr. G. declared that, impressed with the awfulness of the present crisis, he had never reflected upon a subject with more coolness; and, if he understood his own situation, his mind was never in a state more susceptible of conviction.

The proposed measure is expected to eventuate in a final explanation of the relative state of things between the United States and Great Britain. It will probably result, therefore, in an open hostility, with the usual appeal to arms, or in a peace, with all the rights of neutrality attached to it. For this purpose the resolution proposes a sequestration of the debts due to the subjects of Great Britain, to be held as a pledge for the indemnification of the losses sustained by American citizens under the orders of the British King, in contravention of the Laws of Nations, and in violation of every rule of morality and justice. In the course of debate, this subject seems to have resolved itself into two questions. First, as it respects the right of one nation to sequester the property of the individuals of another in any possible case. Second, the policy of exercising this right at this time, under the existing circumstances of the United States.

He presumed that a state of things might exist between two nations in which reprisal would not only become the right but the duty to the nation sustaining the wrong. This happens where one nation, without cause, forcibly seizes upon the effects of another, or of its citizens, and withholds them without restitution or compensation, and when the nation, whose effects shall be so seized and detained, shall possess no other means of indemnification. The right of reprisal in the injured nation, in such a case, grows out of the injury sustained, and its inability to redress itself in any other way.

The duty of the injured nation to make reprisals, is founded upon self-preservation; and in case of the losses of its citizens, upon the promise of the protection of property secretly made by the nation to its individual members.

This he believed to be the doctrine of the laws of morality and reason, and he knew it to be the doctrine of the Laws of Nations, which were, in fact, nothing more than the laws of morality and reason systematized and reduced to writing.

Believing this principle to be a just one, he would apply to the existing state of things between the United States and Great Britain. Almost as soon as Great Britain had taken part in the iniquitous war against France, the Executive of the United States manifested their regard for peace, by proclaiming their existing state of neutrality, and recommending to their citizens, not only the observance of neutrality, but of impartial neutrality—although the partiality of the American people for the cause of France was well known—although, at that moment, their affections for the French nation were addressed by the most honorable and powerful considerations that ever existed between two nations. The peculiar similarity between the existing French cause, and that which had just given birth to American liberty and independence; the material agency which the French nation had exerted in bringing about that event; and the existing principles of Government here, the product of the Revolution, which are the great object of attack by the Combination against France.

A pure and laudable regard for peace, and a detestation of war, however, had overcome all these sensations, and produced a neutrality, which he believed, on the part of the United States, had been rigidly observed; at least, he was sure, that such was the intention of Government. In this state of things, Great Britain commenced an attack upon this state of neutrality, which it was certainly her interest to preserve, and which she ought to have deemed a favor to obtain. Great Britain continued to keep possession of posts upon the acknowledged Territory of the United States, to carry on a contraband trade with our savage enemy. She, shortly after our proclaimed neutrality, proceeded to interrupt our lawful trade with our allies. She seized, condemned, and sanctioned, the complete transfer of the property of American citizens to her own subjects; and, as if there could be no limits to her iniquity and resentment, she has contrived to open upon our Eastern frontiers a barbarous enemy to aid in making depredations upon our commerce.

These acts constitute injuries which amount to war, and they are infinitely aggravated, both by the perfidy which attended the execution of some of them, and the total want of provocation for the commission of any of them.

If, then, Great Britain shall have committed acts towards the United States which furnish just cause of war, the United States possess the right, consistently with the Laws of Nations, to exercise any act towards Great Britain which would be justifiable in a state of war. The United States having received the injuries, are authorized to select such measures and means as they may deem the most expedient for self-preservation and indemnification. Reprisal is within their power. All other means of redress are without their power. In such a state of things, reprisal is a right—reprisal is a duty. An objection, more plausible than solid, has been made to this course of reasoning, that the individuals who will be the immediate objects of the reprisal, have not been the immediate agents of the aggression. The Laws of Nations state, that the property of individuals is as much a subject of reprisal as the property of the aggressing nation; but, as the nation is the immediate agent in the wrong, the individual who sustains an injury thereby, becomes entitled to recompense from his nation. The nation which commits the wrong, by this process, will ultimately sustain the loss. Hence, in the present case, the innocent and unsuspecting victims of the United States, have received losses from the lawless aggressions of Great Britain, and the question is, whether they shall finally sustain those losses, without any clear claim of indemnification upon the Government of the United States? Or, whether the losses shall be transferred to British subjects, who will thereby possess the clearest claim for recompense, from the British Government? He thought the laws of God, the laws of morality, the laws of reason, the Laws of Nations, would all pronounce that the British Government, which had done the wrong, should afford the recompense.

Mr. G. said, that, if the losses were to be ultimately borne by the individual subjects of Great Britain, the remedy would seem to be a harsh one; but, even in that case, the only alternatives left to the United States would be to say, whether their own citizens, to whom they have promised protection, should finally sustain the losses, or the British subjects, to whom they have promised no protection. But the situation of the individuals, who may be the subjects of reprisal, is greatly meliorated, by the consideration of their just claim to recompense from their own Government; which he had no doubt but they would ultimately obtain, if they were put into a situation to demand it; but if they should ultimately be denied justice, it would be a consolation to reflect, that it was the injustice of their own Government, not of the United States.

He observed, that a reprisal, in the way proposed, stood upon the same ground as the invasion of the property, in every other case did, and was justified upon the same principle, to wit: Self-preservation. He presumed, if there existed an acknowledged state of war, letters of marque and reprisal, commissions to privateers, &c., would be deemed justifiable and expedient, and that no discrimination would be made between the property of individuals and the property of the nation; yet, the invasion of the rights of property in that case, would be as palpable, as in the case of the reprisal proposed, with this aggravation; that, in that case, the individual sustaining the loss would not be entitled to ultimate recompense from the Government—in the case proposed he would be entitled to recompense. He observed, that the British nation had not discovered this delicate discrimination between national and individual property, in their late instructions given to their privateers and ships of war, although they had sustained no wrong; and he thought their conduct an example in point for the United States, who had received the injury, and committed none.

A gentleman [Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina] yesterday, attempted to make a distinction between vessels at sea, and other property; although he acknowledged that, at the first blush, he could discern no distinction in principle.

Mr. G. said, that every species of property stood on the same principle—the promise made by the Government to afford protection to all property—the same rights are attached to every species of property, and the Government is bound to afford an equal security to all. A sentence read yesterday, by a gentleman, [Mr. S. SMITH,] from a writer upon the Laws of Nations, clearly shows the right of a nation to make reprisals upon all the effects of individuals of an aggressing nation indiscriminately, except stock in the public funds; which has been exempted, under the idea of its being a pledge in the hands of Government; the withholding of which would be a breach of public faith. He believed that the practice and policy of some nations might have given rise to this distinction, but he doubted whether the practice had been uniform and universal, and he was clear that there was no rational distinction in principle. The idea that the public funds are a pledge in the hands of Government, and ought not, therefore, to be touched, is equally applicable to every other species of property. In the case of contracts between individuals, the Government guarantees the performance upon the refusal of one party to pay or comply. In the case of lands or personal chattels, the Government guarantees the exclusive enjoyment to the proprietor; it would be equally a violation of faith for the Government to deny its obligation in the one case, as in the other, and nothing could justify an invasion of the rights of property, in any case, but self-preservation—the first of all rights, and the highest of all duties.

He positively denied that any pre-eminence was due to one species of property over another. He said, however, that this discussion was not immediately necessary, as the resolution under consideration did not embrace the stock in the funds of the United States.

Mr. G. observed, that it had been said, and repeated in the Committee, that the proposed measure was war. He denied that the measure in itself was war, or that it furnished a just cause of war. He believed, however, that it was problematical whether it would eventuate in peace or war; indeed, he remarked, that the crisis of affairs is already such, that, whether the measure be adopted or not, he viewed war as a probable event, peace as a possible event; but the point he contended for was, that if the aggressions towards the United States be sufficient to justify reprisal, the exercise of the right does not furnish a just cause of war. The exercise of a right by one nation can never involve the absurd consequences of giving another nation the right to exercise a wrong. He said, that gentlemen on one side of this question seemed to act upon an imaginary, instead of the real state of things. He was not, therefore, astonished at hearing the committee cautioned against the violation of neutrality. He did not conceive that the present state of things between the United States and Great Britain would justify the use of the term neutrality. Neutrality is a term used to signify the relation in which two nations stand towards each other. Neutrality therefore requires parties—either party may destroy the relation between the parties. It therefore appeared absurd to him to say that Great Britain was in a state of depredation and war towards the United States, and the United States in a state of neutrality towards Great Britain. It has been said, that the United States have not abandoned their neutrality; this is true, but it is no evidence that neutrality exists. Great Britain has abandoned it for them.

Sequestration of British Debts.

He said, however, that this was disregarding the substance and entering into a mere cavil about names. It was not material in his opinion, what name ought to be given to the existing relation of things between the United States and Great Britain. Whether it was called a state of peace, a state of war, a state of neutrality, a state of reprisal, a state of retortion, or a state of very uncivil conduct on the part of Great Britain. Nor did he conceive it material to ascertain whether there were any intermediate stages between a state of peace and a state of war, or in which state the depredations of Great Britain should technically be classed; but one thing was certain and material—that the United States had sustained substantial wrongs, which required a substantial remedy. Gentlemen who have regarded names and disregarded substances, have also been extremely alarmed at the idea of a discrimination of conduct by the United States towards foreign nations. A gentleman [Mr. Boudinot] observed yesterday, that the United States had sustained injuries from France and Spain as well as Great Britain, and asked why there should be any discrimination in their favor? Mr. G. said he was extremely hurt that the conduct of France should be so unnecessarily and unopportunistically arraigned in that House. He submitted it to the gentlemen to say, if the United States should be compelled to enter into the war, which was at this moment not an improbable event, why then it would be wise to irritate the only nation in the world who could afford them any substantial assistance? He said that this conduct was the less justifiable, from the recollection that the conduct of France was the result of necessity, and that there was every reason to conclude that the conduct of that nation would be explained in a satisfactory manner. But a consideration mentioned by a gentleman [Mr. Smith, of Maryland,] yesterday, was a conclusive answer—the United States owe to France a pecuniary obligation, as well as one of a more sacred nature. This is at all times sufficient for their indemnification. With respect to Spain, if the gentleman would show the injury sustained, and point out a fund for indemnification, Mr. G. declared he would not hesitate a moment to apply it to that object.

But will the gentleman conclude, that because one nation has injured us, in a degree against which we have no redress, that therefore we shall not indemnify ourselves from a nation which has injured us in the extreme, and against which we have the most ample redress?

He believed the gentleman's coolness, his wisdom, and his deliberation, could not possibly lead him to such a result. With respect to discrimination in the conduct of the United States towards foreign nations, it necessarily grew out of the character of the conduct of other nations towards the United States. Some gentlemen appeared to him to have carried their ideas upon this subject to the most fanciful absurdities. To keep France out of the comparison, let this indiscriminate conduct, so much applauded, be applied to Great Britain and Holland. Great Britain destroys our trade, plunders our property, and, to her injuries, adds insult and contempt. Holland, engaged in the same cause, fosters our trade, and respects us as a nation. Under these circumstances, do gentlemen contend that an indiscriminate conduct is due to Great Britain and to Holland? Or do they mean to carry this delicate indiscriminate conduct so far as to refuse to themselves all redress from one nation, because they would wish to deal out the same conduct to all others, whether they had offended or not? He said, that discrimination was stamped in the front of the conduct of foreign nations towards us, and to make an indiscriminate return would be the worst and most unjust of all discriminations. He hoped gentlemen would pardon him, but he could not help thinking that they had carried their ideas upon this subject to the most fanciful absurdities. A gentleman [Mr. Smith, of South Carolina,] yesterday remarked, that of late the condition of war had been much ameliorated as it regards the rights of property, and he thought the amelioration ought to be extended rather than abridged. Mr. G. declared, that he heartily joined him in his wishes that the condition of war would ere long be ameliorated, both as it regards property and persons. He hoped that mankind would soon learn more wisdom than to butcher each other for the amusement or security of the privileged orders of the world. From that source he believed all wars arose, and until the cause was banished from the earth, he feared the fatal effects resulting from it would continue to exist. He declared, that he should view the banishment of the privileged orders from the world as the surest harbinger of the approach of the Millennium. But this is not the happy period of the world; for, although the United States are free from this pest of the human species in their internal organization, yet the evils they at this moment experience arise from their external intercourse with that part of the world which is less fortunate. The attack made on the United States at this moment, is an attack upon property. If there should be a war between the United States and Great Britain, it will be a war of property. Unless there should be a species of madness in the nation not to be calculated upon, they cannot think of invasion and subjugation. It is known that the United States cannot make an attack upon Great Britain, and territory and conquest with them are no objects. Hence the war will be confined to depredations upon property. This is the most dishonorable species of warfare, and therefore the more to be regretted. There is this obvious distinction, however, between the United States and Great Britain. With Great Britain, at least with the privileged orders, it is matter of choice; with the United States, it is matter of compulsion. The United States despise this mode of warfare; they covet not the property of any nation upon earth, but self-preservation demands it. They are under the strong hand of a powerful nation, despising their rights, and regardless of justice. In this state of things, there is but little hope of strengthening the sacred ties of property; for, in the example of Great Britain, her late conduct can furnish no consolation for these theoretic speculations; and however the United States might be inclined to practise upon them, yet the British depredations will forbid them—for submission will be an invitation to new acts of aggression. He most ardently wished the state of things were otherwise; but, exposed to these inconveniences, the most effectual means ought to be adopted for their relief.

Mr. G. proceeded to observe, that having shown the right of reprisal to be conformable to the Laws of Nations, and clearly justified by the existing relation of things between the United States and Great Britain, he would now submit a few remarks upon the policy of exercising the right at this time. Under the existing circumstances of the United States, he thought the policy of the measure was recommended by the clearest and most obvious principles. The relation of things between the United States and Great Britain is such as to demand a final and unequivocal explanation, whether the proposed measure be adopted or not. In all parts of this Committee, in all parts of the United States, a definite explanation is called for. The present state of things between the two nations cannot long exist.

It is to be hoped that the tone of language to be used by the United States will be adjusted to the nature of the injuries they have sustained. Acquiescence and submission are no longer recommended. Hence, matters are already reduced to extremities, and all the irritations already existing which can grow out of an extreme state of things. The proposed measure can add nothing to these irritations. The question therefore appears to be reduced to this—whether, in demanding an explanation and attempting negotiation, we shall use all the means in our power to compel a favorable issue? Or whether we shall tamely supplicate for justice, and suffer the most effectual means of compulsion to elude our grasp? He did not mean here to recapitulate the conduct of Great Britain towards us; he hoped it was sufficiently impressed upon the mind of every gentleman in the Committee; but, after the recent experience of her conduct, it would be madness, it would be folly, to address our complaints to her justice or moderation. He thought it would be wise to lay hold of everything in our power, and hold it as a pledge for her good behaviour. This measure would put us in the best possible situation for negotiation. It would authorize an appeal to her interest, which she could not resist. He begged the Committee to reflect upon the argument which had been used here to prevent a late measure which had been adopted, and which had been renewed upon the present resolution, that a great value in property, belonging to the citizens of the United States was in the power of the British, and that any counteracting measures would place it in extreme hazard. This seemed to him to have been the most prevailing argument which had been urged, and for some time was irresistible. If, then, the argument shall have been applied with so much force here, with how much more force will it be applied in Great Britain, when they find that the property of the individuals of that nation is placed in jeopardy here, and that it greatly exceeds in value the whole of the property which they have infamously detained and condemned? Besides, if, in the event of a war, it should be a war of property, as is every where contemplated, Great Britain will find that the war will be commenced upon very unequal terms. Viewing this measure, therefore, as to its probable tendency to peace or war, he thought the probability greatly in favor of its producing peace. When Great Britain shall find that she is entering into a contest upon unequal terms, when she shall find that it may terminate in a permanent loss of the advantages of her commerce with the United States, when she shall see before her a precipice, into which if she should once enter she never can return, she would pause before she acted, she would take time to count the probable loss and gain, and peace would be the infallible consequence of such deliberate calculations. This measure will convince Great Britain that the United States possess a knowledge of their rights, a confidence in their ability, and a determination in their disposition to assert and support them.

A gentleman [Mr. Smith, of South Carolina,] observed yesterday, that a pacific system would probably attach the people of Great Britain to the United States, and detach them from their own Government. The gentleman ought to recollect, that a pusillanimous conduct will not. It is with nations as it is with individuals—to be respected by others, they should respect themselves. The same gentleman remarked, that a change of Ministry might be expected, and advised waiting for the event. The idea is as undignified as it is chimerical.

Mr. G. said, he knew nothing of the change of the Ministry—the principle was unknown here. The people here were their own Governors. It was immaterial to them who the Minister was. Even in the country where the people were less fortunate, where Ministers govern, a change of Ministers never produced any solid advantage to the nation. It was merely an expedient of the moment, to smother a popular clamor. But, even proceeding upon the gentleman's hypothesis, which Mr. G. thought wholly inadmissible, he submitted to the gentleman to determine, whether a positive submission by foreigners to the avaricious regulations of a Minister, be the most likely mean to render him unpopular at home? On the other hand, whether it was not the most effectual mean of preserving his popularity, and of keeping him in office? He presumed the people at home would never complain of injuries abroad, if those who sustained them refused to complain. It is but by resistance, and throwing the burden upon the people of England, that they can be brought to complain. But in cases of such extremities as the present, all appeals to the people of England are futile and degrading. Our only resource should be in our own exertions. They would be abundantly sufficient, if we could be brought to believe it.

Mr. G. remarked, that the people of Ireland had lately afforded an instructing lesson upon this point. They had arms in their hands for the purpose of asserting their rights; under the idea of acquiescence and submission they had surrendered them to the Government; perhaps, under the expectation of a change of Ministry. Did this act of submission render them more respectable in the eyes of the people of England? Did it encourage the hopes of those who wished the establishment of Government upon the principle of equal rights? Did it not rivet the chains upon the people of England? Did it render the people of Ireland more respectable in the eyes of the people of the United States? To these questions it was unnecessary to give an answer. The people of Ireland resented the usual merits of submission—imposition and insult.

There was another consideration strongly in favor of the policy of the proposed measure. Applications have been already made from different parts of the United States by the immediate sufferers from the British depredations, for an indemnification of their losses. These applications will, probably, be increased, and continued; the agricultural and other interests of the United States will, probably, never consent to equalize this burden. The claims of the sufferers upon the Government will gain additional weight, unless this fund should be offered to them for their indemnification. This is the obvious, the natural and the rightful fund for their indemnification; and he thought it was, at least, the duty of the Government to hold it as a pledge for their security. If this measure should not now be adopted, the refusal will lay a foundation for further parties in the United States, which may ultimately have a serious effect upon the Government.

An objection, of a very delicate and influential nature, has been made to the proposed measure, which required some consideration. That it would affect the character and credit of the Government. He had viewed this objection with the most deliberate attention, and felt the whole force of its imposing delicacy; but was at length perfectly satisfied that it was unfounded. This objection relates rather to the right than the policy of the United States to adopt the measure. If the United States possesses the right of reprisal upon an honest and sound interpretation of the Laws of Nations; if the conduct of Great Britain towards the United States be sufficient to justify the exercise of the right, he believed the policy of exercising the right could never tarnish the American character, nor lessen the credit of American citizens hereafter. The World of Nations, as well as individuals, will easily see, that it was a measure of compulsion, not of choice; that, although the United States believed, they regretted the necessity; that they were not the authors of the original wrongs; that they had borne them with patience, had used their endeavors to prevent the commission of them; and that, when these wrongs were committed and repeated, the United States possessed no other means of redress.

Under these circumstances, in the exercise of a substantial right, he did not believe there could flow any consequential wrong.

The motive would be looked at, and it would furnish a complete exoneration from blame, whilst the original aggressors would become justly responsible for all the consequences.

Mr. G. said, he could not sit down without making some remarks upon the fruits of the conduct heretofore observed by the United States. The most pacific system has heretofore marked the character of the Government. All America looked upon the late proclamation of neutrality as a competent guarantee for peace. He had no doubt but that it was dictated by the purest regard for peace. But what have been the fruits of it? He did not mean to condemn the conduct of the Executive. Perhaps it was suggested by the then existing state of things. He only intended to show, that it had not met with the return it merited, and which was reasonably expected from it.

It has not produced peace. A regard for peace has been construed into a fear of war. A resistance of the feelings of the people for the cause of France has been a palatable food for British arrogance and presumption. Submission to aggression has invited new aggressions; appeals for justice have been deemed testimonies of debility, till at length the United States, after having been stripped of their citizens and property, are upon the eve of a war, because they have not exerted their rights at an earlier period. If this conduct should have been heretofore wise and pacific, experience has taught us that it is no longer so; nothing can be expected from the justice, the honor, or the moderation of a Court, which has proved itself equally a stranger to them all; but, before such a tribunal, acquiescence will beget injuries, injuries will beget insults, and insults will beget contempt and degradation, and war.

Mr. Swift remarked that, on the first view of the subject, he had been inclined to favor the proposition, not having attended minutely to the distinction made by the Laws of Nations respecting the property of an enemy liable to reprisal; but on a full investigation of the subject, and mature deliberation, he was convinced that the proposition under consideration would be a direct and manifest violation of the Laws of Nations; he was, therefore, clearly and decidedly opposed to its adoption. Gentlemen have said much respecting the insults and the injuries which we have received from the British nation; but Mr. S. conceived it to be unnecessary that gentlemen should describe their insults and injuries in the highest colors to inflame our passions, and to animate our resentment. He believed that every gentleman in the Committee deeply felt the indignity which had been offered to their country, and was convinced that Great Britain had been guilty of a violation of the Laws of Nations; but, under such circumstances, it was our duty to conduct with coolness, candor, and moderation. He thought that the heat and passion which had been manifested in the course of the debate were inconsistent with that dignity and propriety which ought to mark the deliberations of the Legislature.

Mr. S. observed, that the conduct of the British Court in regard to their concealing in such a singular manner the order of the 6th of November, and the equivocal terms in which it was expressed, was greatly to their dishonor. But he thought that the words, legal adjudication, would fairly admit of a construction that no American vessel that should be taken pursuant to that order, could be liable to be condemned, unless warranted by the Laws of Nations. There was reason to apprehend that such was the intention of the British Cabinet; and that the Courts of Admiralty in the West Indies, in their condemnations, had exceeded their jurisdiction, and contradicted the design of the Court of London. Recent intelligence confirmed the idea. No information of these illegal transactions had yet been communicated to them. It was possible that when that Court were made acquainted with the injuries we had sustained that they would award restitution or compensation. Mr. S. remarked that, by the Laws of Nations, no nation had a right to make reprisal for any injury till all other means of obtaining justice had failed; that it was our duty in the first place to represent to the Court of Great Britain, the spoliations that had been made on our commerce by the illegal condemnation of our vessels; that, till we had done this, the Laws of Nations would not warrant us to make reprisals on the goods and effects of the British nation. That there was a possibility of obtaining a satisfactory explanation of their conduct and reparation for the injuries we had suffered. It was, therefore, a proper subject of negotiation. But, he said, if that nation will not do us justice, then we are authorized to make reprisals.

Mr. S. then observed that, when we had taken such steps as would authorize reprisal, we should be precluded by the Laws of Nations from adopting the proposition under consideration. He said that a gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Mercer] had yesterday asserted that Burlamaqui was the only authority among the writers on the Laws of Nations against the measure; and that the opinion of Vattel was in favor of it. Another gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Smith] had read a passage from Vattel, which he considered as an authority in point, to justify the seizing of private debts; but not debts due from the public. But if these gentlemen had thoroughly examined Vattel, they would have found, instead of his being an authority in their favor, he had in the most direct terms maintained a contrary opinion. He then read a passage from Vattel, that showed that the effects of an enemy in a country at the time of a declaration of war cannot be seized, but that the owner is entitled to a reasonable time to remove them; and another passage, which expressly declared that, by the usage and custom of modern nations, public and private debts are not the subject of reprisal. Mr. S. conceived that these rules were founded in the highest wisdom; that all debts were contracted under a sanction of public faith, and an understanding that a war should not render them liable to seizure or confiscation; that a moral obligation existed between the contracting parties for the payment of the debts; and that no Government could ever have a right to violate a moral obligation. That, therefore, by the Law of Nations in all instances where property comes into the possession of a nation by a confidence reposed in their honor and faith, as in case of public or private debts, such property can never be the subject of reprisal, because this would be to authorize a breach of public faith; but reprisals are always to be made on property in possession of the nation who has done the injury, and which may be taken without any violation of those principles, which ought to be held sacred in time of war.

Mr. S. remarked, that it had been suggested that the British nation had been guilty of a violation of the Laws of Nations in their treatment of us; and that, therefore, we were not bound to govern ourselves by that law in our conduct towards them. This argument, however plausible, he said, would not bear the test of examination; that all reprisals were justified only on the principle that the nation on whom reprisal is made has been guilty of a previous violation of the Laws of Nations. When a nation disregards that general law by which the conduct of all independent communities towards each other is to be regulated, the same law points out the mode of redress. If there has been no violation of that law, there can be no reprisal. If there has been a violation, then the reprisal must be pursuant to the law, for it is the highest absurdity to say, that because there has been an infraction of a law which authorizes a certain mode of redress, that we may pursue a different mode of redress in violation of the law which gives us the right. This would be at once to renounce the whole system of the Laws of Nations, and throw mankind back into a state of savage barbarity and ferocity.

Mr. S. then adverted to the policy of the measure. He said, upon a fair calculation, it would be found that the adoption of the proposition would be productive of far greater injury to this country than the amount of the losses sustained by our citizens in consequence of the spoliations committed upon our commerce. It is evident that this country, even admitting that a war should take place, would wish to renew their commercial connexion with Great Britain. But if, in contempt of the Law of Nations, we seize on private debts, we shall forever forfeit all credit; no trust can be reposed in our citizens, and no faith in our Government. No foreign merchants will ever deal on credit with our citizens, from a well guarded apprehension that, in case of a war between the countries, the sacred nature of private contracts will not protect them against the hand of a Government which has exhibited the example of a deliberate violation of the Laws of Nations. When we consider the immense advantages that can be derived from private credit and national honor, it will be easy to imagine the infinite mischief that must result from a disregard of those principles.

Mr. S. objected to the measure on the ground that he considered it to be a declaration of war; and he did not think that the circumstances required or justified our taking that step. He said that notwithstanding the unwarrantable proceedings of the British nation; yet, no act had been done by the British Court that clearly indicated an intention to make war directly upon us, or that could be considered as direct and intentional war, though we might consider many of their acts as just causes of making war on our part.

The revocation of the order of the 6th of November, the new instructions of the 8th of January, and the explanation given to the merchants of London, clearly evidenced that a war might be avoided with that nation. While there was the remotest possibility of preserving our peace we ought not to do an act which might endanger a war. While then the conduct of the British Cabinet would admit of an explanation, while there was a prospect that we might obtain by negotiation restitution of the property of our citizens or compensation for the losses they had sustained, we ought to pursue that mode; but if we proceeded to make reprisals by adopting an illegal measure, it must certainly be deemed a declaration of war.

The omission of the regular means of obtaining satisfaction by negotiation and an unwarrantable mode of reprisal would certainly be just causes of war. If we must be driven into a war it would be of the highest advantage to us to conduct it in such a manner as to convince the people of Great Britain that we sincerely wished to avoid it, and that the unjust and illegal proceedings of their own Court have been the sole cause of the war. In such case we have reason to think, that so great is the interest of that nation in preserving our commercial connexion, that a powerful party will be formed in our favor to oppose the injustice of the Government. The sentiments of the people will be against the war, and the Court will find it extremely difficult to maintain it under such circumstances.

But if, without demanding an explanation, we proceed to adopt rash, violent and unwarrantable measures, the spirit of the nation will rise against us, and the people will join the Court in prosecuting a war which will be then deemed just and necessary.

Mr. S. then observed that we ought to take into consideration the present situation of Europe; that the late successes of the French nation had materially changed the political prospect. It was possible that these successes had been the cause which had produced an alteration in the views of the British Court. If events had happened which had rendered the disposition of that nation less unfriendly and hostile, we ought to take advantage of that circumstance, and not to do anything to check the progress of that favorable disposition. He most sincerely hoped that these successes would convince the combined Powers of the impossibility to conquer France, and produce a general pacification.

While such were the prospects, he ardently wished that a measure repugnant to the principles of common honesty and common justice might be rejected; and he hoped that no gentleman in the Committee would vote in favor of a proposition which would fix an indelible stigma on our national character.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

Monday, March 31.

Mr. DEXTER, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the twenty-eighth instant, relative to the execution of the resolve laying an embargo, made a report; which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, during the continuance of the present embargo no registered vessel, having on board goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be allowed to depart from one port of the United States, to any other port within the same, unless the master, owner, consignee, or factor, shall first give bond, with one or more sureties, to the Collector of the district from which she is about to depart, in a sum of double the value of the vessel and cargo, that the said goods, wares, or merchandise, shall be re-landed in some port of the United States; which bond, and also a certificate from the Collector of the district where the same may be re-landed, shall, by the Collectors, respectively, be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury. That the several Collectors be prohibited from granting a clearance to any foreign ship or vessel, in any case whatever, during the continuance of the present embargo, and all armed vessels, possessing public commissions from any foreign Power, (letters of marque excepted,) are to be considered as not liable to the embargo.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled, "An act to provide for placing buoys on certain rocks off the harbor of New London, and in Providence river," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to a resolution to carry into more complete effect the resolution directing an embargo; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution, and, the same being read, was disagreed to. A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to make provision for the widow and orphan children of Robert Forsyth, who was killed in the service of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the state of the Union; and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the state of the Union under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolutions.

And the first, second, third, and fourth resolutions, being severally twice read at the Clerk's table, were, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

1. Resolved, That effectual measures ought to be adopted to complete the present Military Establishment of the United States, and that provision ought to be made that the same may be kept full.

2. Resolved, That an additional corps of artillery, not to exceed eight hundred men, officers included, and also including one chief, and four assistant engineers, ought to be raised for garrisoning the fortifications, which are, or may be erected, for the defence of the seacoasts.

3. Resolved, That the President be authorized and empowered to call on the Executives of the several States, to take effectual measures, as soon as may be, to organize, and hold in readiness to march at a moment's warning, eighty thousand effective militia, officers included, to be apportioned to the States respectively, in proportion to the whole number of white inhabitants; that is to say:

Georgia,	-	-	-	1,338
South Carolina,	-	-	-	3,550
North Carolina,	-	-	-	7,331
Kentucky,	-	-	-	1,532
Virginia,	-	-	-	11,877
Maryland,	-	-	-	5,418
Delaware,	-	-	-	1,256
Pennsylvania,	-	-	-	10,768
New Jersey,	-	-	-	4,318

Rhode Island,	-	-	-	1,697
Massachusetts,	-	-	-	11,885
New Hampshire	-	-	-	3,544

Which detachment of militia shall be officered out of the present militia officers, or others, at the option and discretion of the Constitutional authority of the States, respectively.

4. Resolved, That any independent corps of cavalry, artillery, or infantry, may be accepted, as part of the said detachment of militia, provided they shall voluntarily engage; and provided the same shall be deemed eligible by the President.

The fifth resolution was twice read at the Clerk's table, amended, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be desired to request the Executives of the several States to take effectual care that the whole of the militia, as well as the men detached as aforesaid, be armed and equipped according to law.

The sixth resolution was twice read at the Clerk's table, and debate arising thereupon, an adjournment was called for: Whereupon, the several orders of the day were further postponed until to-morrow.

Tuesday, April 1.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Washington, in the State of Maryland, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read; praying a revision and amendment of the act, entitled "An act concerning the duties on spirits distilled within the United States." Also, the petitions of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Chester and Lancaster, in the State of Pennsylvania, to the same effect.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to Mr. MOORE, Mr. SMITH, Mr. M'DOWELL, Mr. BEATTY, and Mr. SPRUCE, with instruction to examine the same, and report to the House the general operation and effect of the excise in the United States, and the net amount of revenue arising therefrom.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to make provision for the widow and orphan children of Robert Forsyth, who was killed in the service of the United States," was read the first time.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for placing buoys on certain rocks off the harbor of New London and in Providence river;" and the same being read, were agreed to.

The House resumed the consideration of the sixth resolution, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and the same being amended at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for organizing and raising a military force, under the authority of the Government of the United States, to consist of twenty-five thousand men, rank and file, with the proper officers, to serve for the term of — years, or during a war which may break out between the United States and any foreign European Power.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the foregoing resolution, and to the resolutions agreed to yesterday, and that Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. DEARBORN, Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. DAYTON, Mr. IRVING, Mr. MEEGER, Mr. PARKER, Mr. LOCKE, and Mr. PICKENS, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Wednesday, April 2.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to make provision for the widow and orphan children of Robert Forsyth, who was killed in the service of the United States," was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized to grant to the citizens of the United States commissions of marque and reprisals against the Regencies of Algiers, Tripoli, and Tunis.

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill to establish the Post Office and Post Roads of the United States; and the said amendments being severally twice read and agreed to by the House, the said bill was then further amended, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Arthur St. Clair; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of the said report, and that it be recommitted to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. HINDMAN.

THURSDAY, April 3.

A petition of Augustine Skaton, of the State of Virginia, praying compensation for the value of two wagons and teams, the property of the petitioner, which were taken for the use of Colonel Grayson's regiment of the late American Army; also, that he be reimbursed a certain sum of money, which he advanced for supplies of clothing to the said regiment, in the year 1777.

Ordered, That the said petitions do lie on the table.

Ordered, That the committee appointed on the 7th of February last, to report whether any, and what, alterations or amendments are, in their opinion, necessary in the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," also, in the act entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same;" also, in the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and, also, if any, and what, further Legislative provision may be necessary for the securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas, be instructed to report by way of bill or bills.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to encourage the recruiting service; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 27th of February last, providing for the payment of the interest on the balances credited certain States, in the books of the Treasury; and also for the payment, by annual instalments, of the balances due from sundry of the States, on a final settlement of the accounts between the United States and individual States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

FRIDAY, April 4.

An engrossed bill, to encourage the recruiting service, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill, to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

A memorial of the Representatives of the people of the territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, was presented to the House and read, praying that such measures may be adopted as may be deemed most expedient and effectual for the protection and preservation of the inhabitants of the said territory from the hostile incursions of the Indians; also, for the release from slavery of such of the citizens of the United States as are now in captivity at Algiers.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. CARNES, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. MEBANE, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. PRESTON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. GOODRUE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; which was read twice, and committed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you three Letters from our Minister in London; advices concerning the Algerine Mission, from our Minister at Lisbon, and others; and a Letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic to the Secretary of State, with his answer.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, April 4, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MADISON, from the joint committee of the two Houses, appointed to consider and report what business is necessary to be done by Congress in the present session, and what part of the business now depending may be, without great inconvenience, postponed until the next session, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the amendments proposed by the Senate, to the bill entitled "An act limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the committee appointed on the 21st day of February last, to prepare and bring in a bill or bills on the resolutions providing ways and means for defraying the cost of a Naval Armament, and the annual expense thereof, be discharged from further proceeding in the same, and that the said resolutions be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MONDAY, April 7.

A petition of sundry inhabitants of the towns of Salem, Beverly, and Danvers, in the State of Massachusetts, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying a revision and amendment of the existing laws of Congress, granting bounties to vessels employed in the fisheries of the United States, so that the Collectors of the Customs may be authorized and directed to pay, both for the last year and in future, upon all vessels above thirty tons burden, and not exceeding sixty-eight tons, the addition of twenty per centum to the allowances of two dollars and a half for each and every ton of such vessel's admeasurement.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. LYMAN, Mr. WINGATE, and Mr. HOLTEN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to augment the military force of the United States; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. CLARK submitted the following resolution: "Resolved, That, until the Government of Great Britain shall cause restitution to be made for all losses and damages sustained by the citizens of the United States from armed vessels, or from any person or persons acting under commission or authority of the British King, contrary to the Laws of Nations, and in violation of the rights of neutrality; and, also, until all the posts now held and detained by the King of Great Britain, within the territories of the United States, shall be surrendered and given up, all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, shall be prohibited: Provided, Such prohibition shall not extend to vessels or their cargoes, arriving in any of the ports of the United States, before the day of — next."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill directing a detachment from the militia of the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for raising and organizing a corps of artificers and engineers; which was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 2d instant, authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to grant to the citizens of the United States commissions of marque and reprisals against the Regencies of Algiers, Tripoli, and Tunis; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said motion under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized to grant to the citizens of the United States commissions of marque and reprisals against the Regencies of Algiers and Tunis.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, Mr. HARTLEY, and Mr. PARKER, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 27th of February last, providing for the payment of the interest on the balances credited certain States in the books of the Treasury; also, for the payment, by annual instalments, of the balances due from sundry of the States, on the final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said motion under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made by law for payment of the interest on the balances credited certain States in the books of the Treasury, upon the final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. THATCHER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. SAMUEL SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to grant letters of marque and reprisal against the Regencies of Algiers and Tunis; which was read twice and committed.

TUESDAY, April 8.

A petition of Joze Roiz Silva, of the city of New York, merchant, was presented and read, praying that he may be permitted to send the ship called the King David, with her cargo, from the port of New York to Oporto, in Portugal, she being actually cleared out for the place of her destination previous to the arrival of any account of an embargo being laid by the United States on all vessels bound to foreign ports.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the representation from the Legislature of the State of nate to the bill entitled "An act limiting the time for presenting claims for destroyed certificates of certain descriptions;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said amendments under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. And, on the question that the House do agree to the said amendments, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was committed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the headland of Cape Hatteras, and a lighted beacon on Ocracoke Island, in the State of North Carolina," be discharged from the consideration of the same; and that the said bill, together with the representation of Richard Wade, and others, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury thereon, be committed to Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. TALBOT, and Mr. DEARBORN.

THURSDAY, April 10.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the motion of the 7th inst., to prohibit all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland.

Mr. SEDGWICK said he was sorry to rise, unprepared as he was, as he had yesterday occupied a great portion of the time of the Committee as perhaps he was entitled to. He had hoped some other gentleman would have risen, who, having better arranged his ideas than himself, had a preferable claim to the attention of the Committee. Unprepared as he was, he could not permit a question so important as that under consideration to pass, without entering against it his solemn protest: a question involving the dearest interests of our country, and threatening to exchange the unexampled prosperity it had for some years enjoyed, for all the horrors of war. He said he the more regretted the part he was obliged to take on this occasion, because he feared he should, in his vote, divide from many gentlemen whom he much respected; but as his opinion had been formed on mature deliberation, neither his honor, his conscience, nor the duty he owed to his country, would permit him to be silent. If the evils he foresaw should result from the measure under consideration, he wished it might be known that no part of them could with justice be imputed to him as their author. If, therefore, he should be so unfortunate as to stand single and alone, he would not fail to oppose, as far as he could, the measure before the Committee.

That injuries unprovoked and inexcusable had been inflicted by Great Britain on this country, was acknowledged by all. No man felt stronger indignation than himself at the insults which had been offered to our country, and the wrongs which had been done to our citizens; no man was less disposed tamely to bear the haughty and unprovoked aggressions of any foreign nation; no man would go further to procure redress for our wounded honor, and indemnification for our injured citizens. If, after seeking reparation in the way dictated by prudence and humanity, happily prescribed by the modern usages of civilized nations and commanded by the principle of religion; if fair negotiation should be tried, and justice not obtained, he would then seek redress by the means which God and nature had given us. He remembered well the miseries and vices of war, a war in which he had taken a part. It was a war of honor and interest: he well remembered its circumstances and effects. He had lived to see the wastes of that war repaired; to see a state of order and security; to see his country progressing in all the means of happiness. No man who loved his country and rejoiced in its prosperity, would consent, but from inevitable necessity, to see it again plunged in the horrors of war.

Although all combined in opinion that our injuries were great, that they must be redressed, yet no one had suggested that war should precede negotiation. Respecting this, there was happily but one opinion. On every side of the House, it was acknowledged a duty indispensable in our present situation, to state our complaints of injuries to the authors of them, and to demand redress. We were only divided as to the manner of our application, and the circumstances under which our demand should be made. He had already, on another occasion, taken the liberty to declare his opinion of the line of conduct which was dictated by our present situation: that we should manifest that we were averse to war; but, should it become inevitable, we should encounter it with that undaunted spirit which became freemen, insulted in their honor and injured in their rights. He had the most perfect confidence in the bravery of our citizens. At the same time that he knew they would never surrender their rights, he was sensible that they would avoid, if possible, an unnecessary and wanton effusion of blood.

Gentlemen had disclaimed any intention to adopt any measures tending to war; they had said this measure had no tendency to such an event. This assertion he could not believe, because this measure contained a threat of inconvenience; and every threat of inconvenience was a cause of irritation, and every irritation between nations who had already differences to decide, undoubtedly tended to widen the breach, and of course to produce war. If gentlemen were sincere in their declarations, that all differences between America and Great Britain should be terminated by peaceable negotiation, (and he would not call their sincerity in question); if Great Britain was proud, haughty, and insolent, as she had been repeatedly denominated; was it probable, he asked, that she would be more inclined to do us justice, by enlisting her pride and insolence against us?

Mr. S. said, that the late violences by which the property of our citizens had been plundered, was the immediate and avowed cause of the present measure; that as yet no representation of these injuries—no demand for compensation had been made; that such representation and demand should precede hostility was conceded by all. It only then remained to be considered, in what terms and manner such claim should be exhibited. In terms, he said, doubtless firm and decided; but if it was intended to produce the desired effect of peace, and to prevent hostility, the language should be decent and conciliatory. He called on gentlemen to show an instance, in modern times, where a nation complaining of injuries, but desirous of peace, had accompanied their demands of justice with threats of inconvenience? The opposite practice was universally established, and on the known principles of human nature. He appealed to the feelings of every honorable man in the Committee, whether demands for justice and reparation for injuries were enforced by threats? Whether repugnance to a compliance with such demands was not created by such means? If every man felt the operation of this principle, how much more powerful would it be on the minds of the Governors of a nation styled proud and insolent? He said he would charge no man with an intention to involve this country in all the horrors and desolating scenes of war. He could not, however, help declaring, that war or amicable negotiation evidently must decide the controversies between America and Great Britain, and that were his mind determined on the former, he should recommend those measures which gentlemen had brought forward to the consideration of the House, as the most operative means of rendering the event certain, and of banishing every prospect of accommodation. To seize on British property, to confiscate or sequester British debts, to annihilate as far as in our power her commerce, to starve her manufacturers, and to humble her pride; these were infallible means of defeating negotiation, and of uniting, as one man, that nation against us, in all the views of her administration.

It had been said, that a principal benefit to be expected from the institution of Republican Government was, that cool and temperate reflection would direct the conduct of nations. How far our conduct on this occasion had verified such an expectation, he wished gentlemen to reflect. He had himself fondly hoped, in the Government of this country, to have seen these principles exemplified, and all intemperance of expression, and all the heat of passion, banished. It had been said, that a statesman should be all intellect: never, surely, was a time or a country, which more required than the present time, and by this country, the exercise of cool temper, to the exclusion of passion, to conduct with safety the political machine through surrounding dangers. He well remembered a former non-importation agreement; he remembered, too, its effects; they were such as might have been expected; they were such as to convince every cool and considerate man, that the measure itself was impolitic and unwise. It immediately raised the price of all articles of importation to an exorbitant and extravagant height. Hence it was immediately beneficial to importers and shopkeepers, and hence it may be easy to understand why this measure was said to be so popular in Philadelphia and other great towns. But, as the Representatives of the whole People of America, the Legislature ought to reflect, that in proportion as this measure would operate beneficially to the dealers in imported commodities, it would become burdensome and oppressive to those who are best entitled to our regard—the substantial yeomanry of the country—on whom we must principally depend for support, in the arduous conflict which we had too much reason to apprehend. If we must eventually support our claims by arms, the more property we could import before the commencement of war, the more beneficial would it be. In that case, the most wise and prudent policy would be, that which would give the greatest extent to our credit; and, on the contrary, the most unwise and wretched, that which would tend to deprive our people of the ordinary means of supplies.

If this system should prevail, were we to receive British productions through other countries? This would be injuring ourselves, without affecting Great Britain. Was there any other country which could give us the same supplies we wanted? There certainly was none. Were we to depend on ourselves alone, the inconvenience would be great, if not intolerable. What, he further asked, would become of our produce, in the event contemplated? Without entering into a minute detail, he said, he would venture to pronounce that a great part of it would perish on our hands.

It was, he said, doubtful, how far at any time the proposed system might go to distress Great Britain; but, at this time, it would afford facility to her in recruiting her fleets and armies. Were manufacturers and laborers thrown out of employment, and thereby deprived of bread, they would be alike stimulated by want and despair to fight the battles of their country, against those who had reduced them to necessity. In short, he saw nothing which should stimulate the Legislature to adopt this measure, but passion without, and resentment within, these walls. He saw nothing in the system itself, as it respected Great Britain, but vain and ineffectual irritation; nothing in relation to our own country, but defeat, wretchedness, and want.

He said he had taken the liberty to suggest to the Committee certain Constitutional considerations. The answers which had been given had by no means been satisfactory. It was incumbent on gentlemen who had so frequently warned us of the danger of usurping power—who had so frequently, and in language so animated, charged us to avoid grasping power, by implication and construction; it was incumbent on those gentlemen, would they preserve consistency of character, clearly to demonstrate the authority which they assumed, that it might not be supposed that their construction of the Constitution was a convenient accommodation to the existing circumstances. It was not now a question whether the people had made a wise or prudent distribution of the powers of their Government: they had declared their will, and that will we were bound by every consideration of honor and duty to execute.

In the instrument under which we acted, they had declared that the President, under certain modifications, should be their organ, to treat exclusively with foreign Powers. This authority, thus exclusively delegated, includes all the terms on which a treaty could be formed. What was the present measure? Prescribing the terms of treaty, and restraining the Constitutional power from treating on any other terms. If the Legislature could prescribe those terms, in this instance, it may then prescribe all the terms, in every instance; and of course control, in all things, the exercise of that power.

To this reasoning two answers have been given; the one by a gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH,] that the Legislature might make such a law, because the Executive could repeal it. He really could not comprehend the force of the reasoning; he was glad, however, he could, with perfect confidence, contradict the assertion, which he was sure would be a very disgusting one to the people of America. There was, in fact, in no instance, an authority given to the Executive to repeal a Constitutional act of the Legislature. The other answer was that given by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS,] that there could be no objection to the exercise of this power, if it should be assented to by the President and Senate. This was still a more extraordinary and unsatisfactory answer than the other. It implied that the President and Senate could make grants of power to this House not contained in the Constitution. To this he would answer, that all the powers which the House could legally exercise, were expressed in the instrument under which we acted; that those powers could be neither enlarged nor abridged, by any man or body of men on earth, but in the way pointed out by the instrument itself.

Mr. S. said, these considerations he had expressed without any previous preparation, as they occurred to his mind. Should gentlemen who viewed the subject in the light he did remain silent, he would, in the further progress of this measure, he pledged himself, with more orderly arrangement, and he hoped with more perspicuity and force, address himself to the consideration of this Committee, or of the House. It would avail little to tell him that his opposition would be unpopular; no man more than himself wished the good opinion of his countrymen, but no personal inconvenience, no loss of fame or popular affection, should ever induce him to see his country threatened with evils incalculable in number and duration, without warning her of her danger; a country which he loved, and which he might, on this occasion, be permitted to say, he had long served with honest fidelity, and without a single instance of sinister or mere personal regard.

The Committee now rose, and had leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, April 11.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee.

tee of the Whole House on the motion of the 7th instant, to prohibit all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland.

Mr. BOURNARD first rose this day, and said: Mr. Chairman, in a question of so much national importance, there needed no apology from any member of the Committee for claiming their attention, while he gave the reasons for his vote. The impatience shown by his colleague, [Mr. CLARK] or any other gentleman, for the question, ought not to influence any member of the Committee. When the fate of a nation of as much consequence as the United States, appeared to be suspended on a vote, the least to be expected from gentlemen was, to act with freedom, deliberation, and independence. He supposed he should be among those who, at the taking of the question, would probably be found in the minority. That this would be his vote, if he was convinced that he should be single and alone. He felt himself deeply and seriously affected with a view of the precipice on which, in his apprehension, his country seemed to stand, and he wished, for his own part, to take a full and deliberate view of it, before he joined in precipitating a leap, that might not add to her safety or happiness. Reasoning and not declamation should be expected from gentlemen in favor of the measure under consideration.

He said, he would address himself to the judgments, and not to the passions of the Committee. He acknowledged it might fall to his lot to mistake the true and essential interests of his country; but, if this should be the case, he had the satisfaction of knowing that it would arise from the most honest and upright intentions. It was, therefore, on these principles, that he should proceed in giving his opinion on the important resolution on the table.

But, before he went further, he could not forget the respectful compliment paid yesterday by his honorable friend from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH] to his moderation and grey hairs; indeed, he should not have taken it to himself, as he had the honor of having white, instead of grey hairs, had not Mr. S.'s attention been immediately fixed on him. If either age or moderation would command his worthy friend's close consideration of this subject, he besought him, as well as the other gentlemen of the committee, to join in attending to it calmly and seriously for a few moments, before the die was cast. He said, he owed much, on behalf of his country, to that gentleman for his services in the field during the late war, when both his zeal and his passions were rendered so eminently useful, that he could with pleasure apologize at all times for his warmth and animation on any subject when their common country was not to be affected. But would he permit him, earnestly, to request that, with other members, he would call to mind, that they were now the Representatives of four millions of people? That perhaps the lives of thousands of their fellow-citizens were depending on a single vote. That the welfare of a country, dearer to them than life, was at stake. Gentlemen must, therefore, agree, that the question was a serious one, and deserved to be treated with the most serious and deliberate consideration. Judgment, and not resentment, should direct the final determination, let it be what it may, and give a sanction to all their measures.

He observed, that gentlemen against the question had been accused of want of propriety, in looking calmly, and without the exercise of their passions, on the sufferings of the unhappy prisoners at Algiers, and the practical spoliation of our fellow-citizens in the West Indies. Yes, sir, said he, when he knew that it was neither passion nor declamation that could afford effective relief to these suffering members of the political body, he should continue to persist in that steady, serious, and deliberate line of conduct, that, in his estimation, was only calculated to produce that permanent and efficient aid and relief, which their extreme distress so loudly called for; but, in his turn, he asked gentlemen to give up their warmth on this occasion, that they might also reflect, even without passion, on the number of their fellow-citizens that must fall a sacrifice in the most successful war. Will not gentlemen weigh well that vote, that may possibly increase the number of mourning widows and helpless orphans?

These considerations had led him to consider the measure now proposed, as of great moment and importance, and to wish it might be reasoned on and considered in a manner becoming Legislators and Representatives of United America, who have been sent here as her counsellors and trustees, and to whom she has committed her best and most sacred interests. He said, for argument's sake, and to simplify the debate, lest he should be drawn into unnecessary dispute, he should concede for the present: The constitutionality of the resolution proposed; the right of the Committee to originate and determine on the measure; the unprovoked aggressions of Great Britain to warrant and justify the prohibition.

These arguments had been repeated and urged with great apparent force, by gentlemen in favor of the affirmative side of the question, but, were the principles arising from these facts sufficient to justify a determination in favor of so harsh and unprecedented a proceeding, without previously demanding an explanation and full indemnification, agreeably to the customs and usages of other nations?

Would arguments of this kind satisfy our constituents, if they should find themselves suddenly plunged into an expensive and ruinous war? Would it not very naturally be asked, why were not the true interests of the United States under these existing circumstances carefully inquired into, and made the principal and leading object of attentive consideration? In his opinion, this should peculiarly be the sum of their present inquiry—was it not the duty of the Committee critically to examine into the preparation they were in for a step, that in the imagination of some gentlemen of character and reputation, at the last, might precipitate our country into an immediate war? Were our ports and harbors in any tolerable state of defence? Were our magazines and arsenals properly supplied? Were our citizens in a state of organization as a militia? In short, did not the measure threaten a sudden transition from a state of profound peace and happiness, unequalled by any nation, into a state of war and bloodshed, without taking those previous and prudent measures that might probably lead to an avoidance of this national evil, or at all events enable us to meet it with decision and effect?

Gentlemen had referred the Committee to the conduct of America, in 1776, and the success of the late war has been urged for our encouragement. The non-importation agreement has been resorted to as a precedent in point. He said, he was well acquainted with most of the events of the late Revolution. The first motions towards it, found him engaged in the common cause, and his best endeavors to complete and secure it, had never since been wanting. He well remembered the consequences of the non-importation agreement, and the sufferings of our brave fellow-citizens from that imprudent measure. He had tracked them over the frozen ground by their blood, from the want of shoes, and was sensible, that many had perished by the inclemency of the season, for want of tents and clothing; that agreement was universally reprobated, as a measure imprudently entered into on the principle of expecting to be involved in a war, which had it been then contemplated, nothing could have justified. Mr. R. appealed to the knowledge of many men who heard him, that this agreement had often been urged to Great Britain, as a conclusive evidence, that at the time of its adoption, America had not the least intention of independence, or a separation from the Mother country; otherwise, she could never have been guilty of so impolitic a resolution. He asked, then, if the Committee would now repeat the mistake with their eyes open, and expose our country to the same misfortunes, and our fellow-citizens to a repetition of sufferings, by a measure that promised not one important advantage to the Union that he had heard of? In the late war, America had all the ports and harbors of the other European nations open to her, but now circumstances would be altered; in case of a war, the very reverse would be our position, excepting as to those of France.

Mr. R. confessed, that his arguments were founded on his conviction that the resolution was a measure that would necessarily produce war, immediate, inevitable war.

His reasons were drawn from the present state of Great Britain, being in alliance with the principal Powers of Europe, and under treaties to make all wars, arising from the united opposition to France, a common cause.

The necessity she would have of employing her supernumerary hands, if not in manufactures, in her armies and navies, to prevent trouble at home, added to her old grudge against us on account of principles, that promise much trouble to all the Monarchs of Europe. Her late conduct with regard to our trade, founded on the instructions of the 8th June, and 6th November last. Her withholding the posts, contrary to every principle of justice and good faith, and against the most positive assurances. And lastly, from the anxiety to regain the Territory between the Lakes and the Mississippi. He agreed that neither of these singly, nor even the whole together, could justify her in her own opinion, in making an open attack upon us, but might tempt her to construe the measure before the Committee into an act of hostility on our part, as contrary to our professed neutrality. He said, it was a point conceded in the Laws of Nations, that granting to one of the belligerent Powers advantages in your ports, which were refused to another, was a breach of neutrality.

The object with Great Britain would be, to convince her allies, that the aggression arose on account of the war with France, to prevail on them to make it a common cause; and in this they would not want plausible evidence. It was not sufficient, he alleged, that we knew ourselves innocent of the charge. We should be prudently careful not unnecessarily to give reason to justify the construction. If the previous steps of negotiation, used by all civilized nations, were neglected, they would have the advantage of the argument and we should injure ourselves. He asked if any gentleman would say that a prohibition of commerce at the eve of a war, or even the apprehension of it, was wisely calculated to clothe an army, replenish our magazines, supply our arsenals or provide a revenue by which to support a war?

He wished every member had taken the trouble he had done, of looking into their stores, inquiring what was on hand, calculating what would be absolutely necessary, and reflecting seriously and dispassionately on the sources of supply. If they had, he doubted not but that they would find something more than passion and resentment necessary, to meet the probable consequences of so premature a determination.

It was no uncommon thing for gentlemen to differ on important measures; and he would not even insinuate, that he might not be found wrong in these ideas, and wholly mistaken in his conjectures on this occasion, but he begged members to consider the different ground on which the two sides of the House stood. If the minority, of whom he expected to be one, should in the end be found to have been alarmed with consequences altogether unfounded, and that the issue proved successful to the peace of our common country, they would have the happiness of rejoicing with the majority in their superior wisdom and foresight; and though even they should suffer in character, yet their country would be saved. But if the minority should be deluged in a destructive war, and her best interests be endangered by the discovery of the misresolution, would seriously regret, that they had not at least used more caution.

He said, as at present advised, he should give his vote against the resolution. It would be from a thorough conviction, on the most careful examination, that the resolution was against the interest and welfare of the United States, all circumstances considered. And this he should do, wholly regardless of the malevolent insinuations that Britain had an influence in that House. He felt a conscious dignity of mind, a virtuous pride of heart, in believing that it was not all the wealth of that opulent nation could purchase his influence to a single measure injurious to his country; and under that conviction, he could not believe there was a member of the Committee in a different predicament.

He again repeated, that he should most sincerely rejoice, if this measure should be adopted, to find, in the end, that his mind had viewed it, as productive of consequences that were wholly unfounded; and, although under his present view of the subject, considering it as inimical to his country, he was bound in conscience to vote against it, yet the Councils of America were directed by superior wisdom, and that this country had reaped the rich harvest of peace and happiness. But it might now be asked, if it was meant passively to submit to the injuries acknowledged on all hands to have been sustained by the impetuous and overbearing conduct of Great Britain? He answered no, by no means.

He would follow the examples and pursue the measures of other nations in like circumstances—examples and measures founded in policy and sound understanding. He would, by a special Envoy, make known to that Court, our sense of her unwarrantable aggressions; he would demand immediate indemnification for the present, and security against future sufferings of the like nature—insist on a categorical answer, after applying to her justice and best interests; and if at last a war must be only means of obtaining justice, he would then (being previously prepared) meet it, as became a free and independent nation, trusting to the righteousness of her cause.

By this means the other nations of Europe would be made acquainted with our complaints—become witnesses to our love of peace, and bear testimony to the justice of our appeal to arms. He said, he had fully considered the question—he had viewed it in every point of light—he had endeavored to consider the consequences which most probably would arise from it, and he could not convince his mind, that the measure would be productive of any good to the United States, while it offered many reasons to conclude, that it might be fraught with the greatest evil. In case of the most successful war, America had nothing to gain, while her loss of blood and treasure was sure and certain. He had once flattered himself that this was the only country on the globe, whose interest it was to be at peace with all the world, and at the same time the interest of all the world to be at peace with us. But he feared we had been so much actuated by a resentment of injuries received, as to lose sight of our true interests under existing circumstances, and, therefore, should be hurried into measures we might hereafter have reason seriously to lament.

The Committee now rose.

MONDAY, April 14.

A petition of Philip Allen and Zachariah Allen, of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, merchants, was presented to the House and read, praying that they may be exonerated from the payment of the duty imposed on foreign vessels, to which they will be subjected in the case of the ship Marie Indienne, which was purchased by the petitioners in the Isle of France, to bring home the cargo of the brigantine Abigail, an American bottom, which was rendered unfit for the voyage, and incapable of being repaired; also, that a special act may be passed, authorizing the Collector of the district of Providence to register the said ship as a vessel of the United States.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. FOSTER, and Mr. S. BOURNE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to "An act to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States;" which was read twice and committed.

A memorial of sundry citizens of the City of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, was presented to the House and read, praying that Congress may adopt such measures as in their wisdom shall be deemed most expedient and effectual for placing the said City of Annapolis in a state of defence.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the committee last appointed.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the present embargo be continued, and every regulation concerning the same shall be in full force until the — day of —.

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the motion of the 7th instant, to prohibit all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland.

Mr. SWIFT commenced his observations by remarking that it was extremely painful to consume the time of the Committee in discussing a measure, when it was apparent that there was a decided majority against the opinion which he entertained. But the resolution on the table deeply affected the interest of his country, and would probably be productive of the greatest injury; he therefore deemed it proper for him to offer his sentiments on the subject. He said, if we turned our attention to a period not very remote, we should find our country flourishing in the highest prosperity and felicity; but the prospect had lately been changed. We have been attacked on all sides, and our commerce nearly destroyed. In the West Indies, we have not only suffered spoliation on our trade, but our citizens have been exposed to the most aggravated insults and abuse. All wished to obtain redress for these injuries: the difference of opinion respected mode. It was, therefore, extremely unfair to charge the gentlemen who opposed this measure with tameness under the insults and injuries offered to their country, because they deemed this mode to be inefficient, when they declared their readiness to pursue those measures which they conceived were most effectual to obtain satisfaction for the injuries we have sustained.

The gentlemen who advocate the resolution on the table, contend, that it is calculated to prevent a war, to preserve peace, obtain satisfaction for our injuries, and bring Great Britain to her senses. If such would be the effect of the measure, no person would oppose it. But what reason have we to believe that such will be the effect it will produce? The only principle by which the measure can operate, is, that so important and interesting to Great Britain is our commercial connexion, that rather than sacrifice it, they will comply with our terms. But can it be said, that our commerce is so important to them, that to deprive them of it will necessarily produce this effect? The contrary was demonstrated in the late war, which terminated in our Revolution. The British nation were able to exist not only without our commerce, but, at the same time, to carry on a war against us and against France, Holland, and Spain, in which they obtained victories over the fleets of those nations. All this they were enabled to do without our commerce, and they cannot now be said to be so dependent on us that they cannot live without us. It cannot, therefore, be said that this measure must necessarily produce the effects which are contemplated.

Mr. S. observed, that there were conclusive reasons to believe that the resolution would not produce such effects. It must certainly be considered as containing a menace—a threat, and as dictating terms to Great Britain. All acknowledged that nation to be haughty, insolent, and imperious, in the highest degree. Will not their pride and importance be wounded at an attempt to impose upon them the conditions by which our commercial connexion is to be continued? Will they not consider the national dignity to be insulted? Will it not excite a resentment and indignation that will preclude all possibility of reconciliation? The sentiments of the British nation in these respects are by no means to be justified, but if we intend a negotiation, we ought to pursue it in such a manner as will probably produce success, and not address a proud nation in that menacing tone which will defeat the object we wish to obtain. It happens that some gentlemen have made singular calculations upon the success of this measure. They suppose that if Congress pass an act prescribing the terms of accommodation, and transmit it to our Minister resident at London, that Great Britain will be alarmed and frightened at the prospect of the loss of our commerce; that they will immediately comply with our terms, and make us the reparation we demand. An act of Congress is to govern one of the most proud, insolent, and powerful nations on the globe. If we are not proud and insolent, we at least have a claim to a liberal share of vanity and self-confidence. This would be an excellent instrument to govern the British nation; but we have reason to think that they will laugh at the idea, instead of being frightened.

Mr. S. then remarked, that we ought to pursue a different mode; that, by the Laws of Nations, negotiation, unaccompanied by any menacing measures, was the proper step, and there was the fairest prospect of success. He considered the controversy and dispute subsisting between Great Britain and the United States to be in a situation peculiarly proper for negotiation, and that there was the fairest basis for explanations and accommodations. He said that no complaint had been made on our part to the Court of Great Britain, stating our injuries, and demanding satisfaction; and that when Mr. Pinckney, our Minister at London, demanded an explanation of the intention of the British Court, by the order of the 6th of November, they declared that no condemnations were to take place in virtue of it, which would not have been legal if the order had not been issued. A construction was put upon that order by the Ministry, which denies the principles on which the condemnation in the West Indies had been founded, and which of course disavows the transactions of which we complain. We may, therefore, fairly suppose that the Court of Admiralty in the West Indies have contradicted the orders and intentions of the British Ministry. We have not heard what effect these condemnations of our vessels have had on the British Court. If we should state to them the injuries we have sustained—which we ought to do, as they have been committed in a remote part of their dominions, apparently contrary to the design of the Court—there is the strongest reason to believe that we shall obtain redress; because, by their own construction of the order of the 6th of November, they have disapproved of the principle by which the injuries have been committed, and of course they are bound, by their own construction, to make us that satisfaction which we demand.

Mr. S. said, if we conducted a negotiation without giving offence, it was probable we should obtain the influence of the British subjects in our favor. If, when the American merchants in London, discovered the order of the 6th of November, they were alarmed, and immediately demanded an explanation of the Court, this shows that there is a powerful interest in that country in favor of a commercial connexion with this. If we do nothing to wound their pride, this influence will be exerted to preserve the connexion. The mutual interest and welfare of both countries may be fairly taken into consideration, in adjusting the dispute. But if we adopt a menacing measure, offensive to the nation, we shall lose the influence of our friends in accomplishing an accommodation. While such is the state of our affairs, we ought to try a fair negotiation, on equal and liberal terms, unembarrassed by any menace or insult, and there can be no doubt but that the measure will be attended with success. But if Great Britain will not negotiate and do justice to this country, Mr. S. pledged himself to support the most energetic measures to assert our rights, and maintain our national dignity. When war had become unavoidable—and that time might happen—he would meet it with firmness and fortitude; but while it was possible to preserve peace, he conceived it to be a duty he owed to his country to do all in his power to preserve it.

Mr. S. observed, that while he considered negotiation to be attended to by all nations, he had particular reasons to wish that it might be adopted by the United States. He wished that this Republic might establish and act upon a principle which was calculated to bring national disputes to an amicable accommodation and prevent the calamities of war.

Mr. S. then remarked upon some particular objections to the resolution. He said that the surrender of the Western posts and payment for negroes carried away contrary to the Treaty of Peace was a subject of controversy that had no connexion with and ought not to be connected with the spoliation committed on our commerce; and was calculated not only to prevent the obtaining of that compensation to which our merchants were entitled, but to cut off forever all commercial intercourse with Great Britain. It is a well known fact, that Great Britain has charged the United States with being guilty of the first infraction of the treaty, and that the United States have retorted the charge. While they seriously believed, that we were the first violators of the treaty, what would they say to an act of the Legislature which renounced all connexion with them, unless they would fulfil the terms of a treaty which they considered themselves to be discharged from by our first violation? Could it be expected, that they would comply with terms so haughty and insolent? Could any person suppose that the proud nation of Great Britain would humble themselves before us in this manner? Would they not consider their national honor to be affected, and abandon all connexion with us before they would submit to terms so humiliating and degrading?

Mr. S. remarked, that he did not mean to say, that the United States first infringed the treaty; for the purpose of his argument, it was sufficient to say, that Great Britain thought so, and such being her impression the same consequences would follow as if such was the fact. And the dispute respecting the Western posts, which could be of but little importance to this country, might forever interrupt a commerce which was of the greatest importance. He did not think that the Western posts were worth so great a sacrifice.

If this resolution be adopted, we cannot recede in honor unless there be a compliance with every article. It may then happen that a dispute respecting some trifling subjects may prevent a restoration of that commerce which will be of great and important value. But if we do not in the first instance give them our ultimatum we may discover the terms on which they will negotiate, and then it will be in our power without any embarrassment from an antecedent law to consider what is best to be done, and make any concession that our interest requires and which is compatible with honor.

If Great Britain should be disposed to negotiate and comply with the conditions we offer, such is the nature, variety and extent of our disputes, that the discussion and adjustment of them would require so great a length of time, that the loss arising from the interruption of our commerce during that period would be of greater consequence than the objects of dispute. For, if this measure be adopted, we must expect a total interruption of all commerce with all parts of the British dominions, as relative to exports as well as imports, for though the resolution only contemplated the prohibition of manufactures from Great Britain and Ireland; yet, we might be satisfied that Great Britain would not give us a trade that was profitable only to ourselves.

Mr. S. observed that we ought to consider that if this proposition should be adopted what great alterations would take place in the value of property; foreign articles would rise, and domestic fall. An immense profit would accrue to the owners on the Spring goods which might arrive before it was intended that the act should commence its operation. There could be no doubt but that in a short time a variation in the value of property contrary to the interest of this country would take place to a far greater amount than all the spoiliations which had been committed on our commerce. Merchants who had large quantities of goods on hand, would profit by the measure, and the agricultural part of the community would be obliged to sustain the loss.

It had been suggested that the people were anxious for the measure. It was probable that some, who had a particular interest to serve, by the interruption of trade, were in favor of it; but the most considerate part of the community were by no means of that sentiment. But let the popular opinion be what it would, too much had been said about it. We are not to be influenced by such considerations, but are only to regard the public welfare. That we ought to guard against all popular influence as being of the most dangerous tendency. That there was no danger to be apprehended from the Government; that it had not the power, and had never shown any disposition to encroach upon or oppress the people; that the only danger that exists is from the encroachment of the people on the Government, and if the Government ever does fall, it will be owing to the too great prevalence of a local popular influence, which does not speak the general sense of all the community.

But if this resolution should be rejected and a negotiation pursued, it will be accompanied with an implied declaration that if it fails, the United States will take proper steps to obtain redress, which will have all the influence to enforce and facilitate a negotiation that can be derived from this measure, unembarrassed with any of the inconveniences. If the negotiation should fail, we can have recourse to this measure with the same efficacy then, as now, and it will produce the effects; for our commerce must be as important to Great Britain at the end of six months as now.

It had been suggested that the opposers of the resolution were under British influence and interest. Mr. S. did not intimate that any gentleman of the Committee had thrown out that idea, but he said it was a popular opinion, and very prevalent. He remarked that the charge was unjust, cruel, and unfounded; that for himself, he felt no influence; he stood on American ground, and was influenced only by American feelings. He did not advocate any commercial connexion with Great Britain from any regard to that nation, but merely from a regard to his own country, whose interest he conceived to be promoted by that connexion. He remarked that some, who were considered as British agents, had boasted of their influence in the Legislature. He declared that no such influence existed; and that he most heartily despised those persons, who had the effrontery to pretend that it did exist.

Mr. S. remarked that a popular opinion in some parts of the Union had been prevailing, that many of the Representatives in Congress were under such an influence arising from the funding system, that they dared not adopt measures necessary for the public defence, for fear the interest of the national debt should remain unpaid. He said that a most unreasonable and unfounded jealousy respecting the funding system existed among the people; that he was satisfied, during the time he had held his present office, that no measure had been influenced by an exclusive regard to the public debt; that he had never owned a farthing in the public funds; but he considered that, let whatever events take place, the national debt must be paid; that if it were necessary he would vote for a land tax for that purpose, for he considered the faith of the Government pledged for the payment of that debt, and he would never violate the national faith; such being the security of the debt, none of the holders had any reason to apprehend a failure of payment, and therefore none of the Committee could be influenced by an apprehension of the failure of payment.

Mr. S. said that we ought to consider the tendency of this measure to a war. Many of the friends of it had denied this, and declared that they considered it to be a peaceful measure; but will all say this?

A gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. DAYTON] has said that he is in favor of it; because he considers it to be a stepping stone to the threshold of sequestration. Mr. S. said that he respected the virtues and the talents of that gentleman; he believed his integrity to be unimpeachable, and that he acted from the purest motives; that he did not wish to wound his feelings, but that he was bound in duty to express his sentiments respecting any proposition he should make; he considered the proposition of sequestration as connected with this measure by what the gentleman himself had said, and from thence he derived an argument against it. He had said that this resolution was the stepping stone of sequestration; if that be true, Mr. S. said he should step on this stone with horror and indignation; he should consider it to be the step stone to the temple of infamy, wretchedness, and ruin; he considered that it would not only involve his country in disgrace, but in all the calamities of a war.

He said that gentlemen ought to unfold the whole system of their measures with their object and design, and not deceive people into measures which they would reprobate if they knew the consequences; that he believed while there were gentlemen who had nothing but peace in view, that there were many who intended to defeat a negotiation, to dissolve our commercial connexion with Great Britain forever, and who were willing to plunge us into a war with that nation. If gentlemen had not that design, let them come forward and declare it; but while there was reason to suspect such a design, the gentlemen who were in favor of the resolution under consideration, but intended nothing more, ought to be cautious how they adopted a measure that would lead to the most mischievous consequences.

On a full consideration of the subject, Mr. S. said that he was convinced that this measure would lead to a war; but if a fair negotiation should be attempted, he had no doubt but that all controversies might be settled, ample satisfaction obtained, commerce restored, and that our country would continue to flourish and prosper.

Mr. SMITH (of S. C.) was opposed to the measure, because it was inconsistent with that spirit of negotiation which was contemplated not only by the Executive, but by Congress; for, although some members seemed adverse to any further attempt at negotiation, yet it was evidently the wish of a considerable majority to give it another trial.

The measure carried with it a menace: it held out this language: that, unless Great Britain would consent to certain measures, the United States would punish her by certain other measures. This language had a direct tendency to defeat all negotiation; for no nation would ever treat on such terms. Even were Great Britain disposed to make complete satisfaction for every injury, her pride would restrain her from making concessions which might appear the result of threats and apprehensions.

This has been compared to the case of an individual, and it had been shown that, in common life, no man of spirit would make atonement for an injury when demanded with a threat of punishment, if withheld. Mr. S. applied the case to ourselves. He brought it home to the feelings of the members themselves, and he asked if they, under similar circumstances, either as private or public characters, would not, from a spirit of national pride, spurn at the idea of having redress extorted by menaces?

Great Britain would be disposed to make or withhold reparation according to events in Europe, and according to her view of the advantages or disadvantages resulting from a war with the United States. By that view would her answer be governed. Should the nation hesitate with respect to peace or war, a measure like this would undoubtedly decide them against peace. Their language would naturally be, "we were disposed to accommodate all differences on the most amicable terms; but such a disposition, under the present circumstances, would appear to be the result of fear excited by your threats, and commit our reputation in the eyes of all the world. You must, therefore, pursue your measures, and we shall pursue ours." Mr. S. asked whether this would not be the language of every nation in a like situation? He was persuaded it would be ours. There was nothing pusillanimous in asking reparation in decent terms, unaccompanied with threats. It was the common practice of all nations. Genoa had recently, though her neutrality had been violated, and her port blocked up, sent an Envoy Extraordinary to Great Britain to demand satisfaction. Her demand was couched in mild and civil language; yet Genoa was universally applauded for her firmness and the dignity of her conduct as a neutral Power. It was not enough to say that we had been grossly insulted; this was admitted in its fullest extent. But every nation, when it required redress, was previously insulted. The very demand of satisfaction implied antecedent injury. Nations, however, negotiated without threats. Why, then, did gentlemen so frequently cry out, what! shall we negotiate with a nation which has violated our rights? He would ask those gentlemen, when negotiation was necessary, but in the case of violated rights? He would further ask them, whether they were not the first to urge negotiation with the Dey of Algiers, who had captured our vessels, and degraded our miserable fellow-citizens to the level of beasts of burden? Whether they did not oppose the Naval Armament, lest it should irritate the Algerines, and prevent the success of negotiation? Was it not the constant policy of this country to negotiate with the Indians when practicable, rather than to make war with them? Why, then, raise objections to a negotiation with England? Or why, after having admitted that negotiation shall be attempted, defeat it by these projects? If a majority of the House are ripe for war, let us say so, and act consistently; but let us not hold one language at one time, and contradict it at another; let us not say we are for peace, and immediately adopt a war measure.

Mr. S. inferred from these observations, that negotiation being determined on, he was bound to resist any and every act which tended to frustrate that negotiation. But, while he was thus for the swartler in modo, he was, at the same time, for the fortiter in re, and he called upon the advocates of this scheme to join him in those measures, which, at the same that they were free from the foregoing objections, would, in his opinion, rather give effect to the negotiation, or prepare us for the event of its failure.

A gentleman had said, we have fortified our harbors, we have filled our arsenals, we have increased the Military Establishment: now we must do something more. But the gentleman, in the warmth of his imagination, had mistaken things to be done for things actually done. The fact was, that the gentleman was entirely unfounded in all these assertions. We have not fortified our harbors, we have not applied our arsenals, we have not augmented our military strength. It is true we have it all on paper, but the very revenues necessary for the existence of all those essential points, are not yet reported by the Committee of Ways and Means; and, until those revenues exist, the laws we have passed will be of little avail.

It was proposed by the law, that the non-impertation should not take effect till November next, and that distant period was fixed for its operation, to afford time for the result of the negotiation, and that Congress might previously be in session, in order to repeal the law if the negotiation should succeed. Thus, while the very law itself admitted the propriety of a negotiation, it carried with it the very death-wound of all negotiation, by expressly purporting to be in terrorem. If it was not intended as a threat, why not wait till November, and then adopt the measure, if expedient. Suppose this House should in November deem the measure inexpedient, they cannot repeal it without the concurrence of the Senate and PRESIDENT. Thus they forestal the judgment of the House, and deprive themselves of that independence which they ought to possess, to act in the next session according to their then view of things.

Some members had proposed the 1st of November, in order to admit the Fall goods; but, if that was the design, the period would be an improper one, for it would be extremely unequal in its operations. In some of the States, the Fall vessels might generally be arrived by that time; but, in some of the Southern States, they would be generally excluded, and those States deprived of their expected supplies.

He further objected to the measure, on the grounds of its dictating the terms of negotiation, which was not within the province of the Executive, and so far a departure from the spirit of the Constitution; but this ground having been fully discussed by other members, he should not dwell on it.

One member had expressed an affection for this measure, because it was, as he had termed it, a stepping-stone to sequestration. Mr. S. thought it would be more properly called a stumbling block to negotiation. He disapproved of it in both shapes. He objected to it, both as to the mode in which it appeared, and as to the time; as to the mode, because it specified particular grievances, and thus, while it embarrassed our Executive, it menaced the Executive of the nation with whom we were to treat, and made the redress of those specific grievances the sine qua non of all future intercourse; as to the time, because as it was not to take effect till the next session of Congress; there could be no other view in passing it now, but that it might operate as a threat; and, as this intention could not be mistaken, it would undoubtedly defeat all accommodation. Such being his view of the subject, he could not reconcile it to his duty to vote for it. He thought Congress owed it to their constituents to avoid a war, if possible. The ground of negotiation being taken, they were bound to reject every measure which might have a tendency to defeat it, and to do every thing which might give it a fair chance of success. But while he said this, (as a neutral nation could not justly give umbrage by taking measures to support her neutrality and assert her just rights,) he pledged himself to concur in every act which might place us in a condition to make ourselves respectable, to vindicate our national honor, and to obtain ample retribution for any wrongs which the course of events might leave undressed.

Mr. DEXTER introduced his observations by remarking that he had never risen with so great reluctance on any former occasion. At so late an hour when patience seemed exhausted, when reasoning had given place to invective, when to oppose the resolution was but soliciting reproaches, when the friends of it, confident of a majority, were from all sides of the House impatiently calling for the question, when the mover of it heard arguments against it only that he might treat them with contempt, and their authors with insult, he said it was in vain to ask for an attentive hearing. He should not have risen but for a remark just fallen from a gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DAYTON] which had forbidden him to be silent. That gentleman, said Mr. D., has told us that the present measure is a stepping-stone to sequestration of British debts. Viewing it therefore as the beginning of a system of hostility, which is to be so peace, but our national honor, the duty to resist it becomes indispensable. Whatever may be thought of making laws to annihilate the ties of honor and personal confidence, and to dissolve the moral obligation of contracts; whatever may be thought of the modern usage of nations, which probably from general consent has become a law, which cannot now be violated without perfidy; whatever might be thought of the odium it might bring on our national character, and the complete destruction of our credit at a moment when we shall need the utmost extent of it; we have not taken those previous steps for pacific accommodation, which the custom of nations and all writers of authority hold to be the first in order and indispensable. We have not made that demand for a recompense, which ought to precede every species of reprisal. After the observations, sir, which I made in the beginning of the debate, it will not be thought strange that I suffer on the present occasion an unusual conflict of reasoning and of feeling. I then stated, with the frankness which I felt, and with the zeal which the hazardous crisis of our country inspired, the reasons and passions which kept my mind in a state of vibration. Struggling with indignation at the injustice and folly of Britain, I said we have suffered until confidence is folly—until patience is a crime. Believing that the resolution involved a principle, which might be useful both for obtaining justice and preserving peace, but that its present shape rendered it not only useless but injurious; believing, too, that it is improper for this branch of our Government to begin a negotiation with a foreign nation, and promptly dictate the terms of it, I proposed an amendment, which left the principle in all its force, and avoided some of the objections. We have heretofore heard much about a spirit of accommodation; but the friends of this resolution have not discovered it. After wearying themselves in hunting for a reason against the amendment, it was negatived without any. They will agree with us, but it must be precisely on their own terms. This is the language of accommodation: Hear and believe whatever we teach; stoop down and bear whatever we impose. Victory is in our own power; a triumph is better than peace. If, sir, it be connected with discord and public calamity, the laurel is too withered to excite my envy. If, amid the fire which rages, we have not forgotten the cause which produced it, we must remember that the condemnations of our vessels in the West Indies, in consequence of the orders of the British Government of the sixth of November, are the great and immediate cause of complaint. Have we, sir, demanded a recompense for this injury, and waited a reasonable time for an answer? So far is this from fact, that we have not taken one step towards this, nor have we even heard from Britain since it was known there that any condemnations have taken place.

Our last despatches from our Minister at London tell us, that Lord Grenville declared that he presumed no condemnations would take place in consequence of those orders. The words themselves certainly do not justify any.

Have we any right to say that a demand of recompense would be fruitless, when the injuries we complain of are thus expressly disavowed by the Minister? Did we know that a demand would be fruitless, still we ought to make it, in conformity to the usage of nations, from a decent respect to their opinion, and to convince them, in case of a war, that our enemies are altogether the aggressors, and that we have been just and circumspect. We are judging in our own cause, and we ought not to trust ourselves to deviate from established principles, lest prejudice should mislead us. But it is said that we have negotiated in vain, respecting the breaches of the Treaty of Peace, and that the delays here are sufficient to justify immediate war. Do we not know, sir, that there are two sides to that negotiation? Have they not made demands on us for breaches of the same treaty? The negotiation is still pending in the ordinary train. We have never given them our ultimatum on the subjects of it. It is now under the direction of the Executive, which is the Constitutional authority. It is not proper for us to assume to put an end to it by an act of legislation. Who, sir, that calls himself an American, would dare to pursue a measure which may tarnish our national honor? If any one would take even a doubtful step, "shame ought to burn his cheek to cinder." To prevent being misunderstood or misrepresented, perhaps I ought to say here, that I by no means deny our right to regulate or prohibit American commerce, I only mean that if the present controversy should end in war, we cannot justify engaging in it without first demanding justice, and if we make this demand with circumstances which forbid success, we do not comply with the spirit of this rule, but evade it. Taking the measure now proposed, would forbid Britain to treat with us on the subject. We know that we should refuse in similar circumstances. Are we more proud than Britain? Did any nation ever begin negotiation with threats? The external forms of regard on such occasions are so excessive, that nothing but custom prevents this appearing ridiculous. Humanity, as well as usage, requires that every peaceful method should be tried, and that too in the form best calculated to be successful. Faithfulness to our constituents requires this. Their interest and their wishes are against courting war.

But, sir, we are told that negotiation is pusillanimous. Passion is called American feeling. We hear much about energy, and some seem to think that the occasion calls for insult. Sir, noise and declamation are very distinct from fortitude and patriotism. The bravest men do not bluster and threaten. Why should it be thought too tame a measure to state the injury, and with manly firmness demand a recompense? The pride, the petulance of Kings, has always submitted to this, but the moderation of a republic forbids it. More proud than Kings—more insolent than tyrants—we despise this law of humanity, this compact of mankind. Where is the despot, the ermined monster, who dares to spread desolation and havoc, without demanding first his right? And where, sir, is the difference between not demanding at all, and demanding in such a way as to insure a refusal? How much justice there is in the charge of pusillanimity, which has been so often and liberally made, I will not undertake to determine. Perhaps he who pursues with decent firmness the steps which propriety, humanity, and general consent have provided, and while he feels the strongest indignation, is too proud to throw dirt or threaten, but places himself in the best posture of defence, lest war should follow unsuccessful negotiation, is as truly magnanimous as he who talks loudly of revenge, avows passion as his principle, call hard names to produce conciliation, and gives blows to keep peace, who at the same time does every thing to provoke war, and opposes every measure to prepare for it. Lest the difficulties of the present crisis, and the attack on the pride of Britain, by prefacing our demand with a threat, should not be sufficient to prevent a recompense and provoke to war, old causes of controversy are added. The breaches of the Treaty of Peace, by detaining the posts and negroes, are old subjects of complaint.

Why they are brought forward now, and made an indispensable preliminary of treaty, when Britain is aided by a powerful confederacy, and the world is like tinder, is difficult to conceive, unless we wish to kindle here the flame of war. Further, sir, this throws such an unequal burden on our merchants, as amounts to oppression. They have already suffered extremely from British and other depredations. They bear the principal burdens in raising our revenue. Is it right to add to all this, and forbid many of them to exercise that business, by which they get their bread, until Britain shall not only make compensation for their recent injuries, but also settle the old matters of difference precisely on our own terms? We are connecting matters which our interest requires should be separate. Britain, following our own example here, will say that by the treaty all British debts were to be paid; but the State laws and the Courts of Virginia have prevented this. They offer to set off these against the injuries suffered by our merchants, and perhaps the balance will be against us. Will this be protection to the sufferers? Yet, if we connect these claims together we cannot object to their doing the same. It is throwing on the merchants all the political evils and burdens of America. Yet we who oppose this measure have been charged with wanting feeling for their suffering. Provoking an unnecessary war will sacrifice all their property now abroad, and deprive them of all hope of recompense, for that which has been already condemned. Going to war is surely no way to induce Britain to make compensation; and it is as certain, that this country will be under no obligation to do so, if war shall be the issue. This country is bound to indemnify them only when we refuse to obtain satisfaction from Britain, or to avenge their wrongs. What inconvenience should we experience from the delay occasioned by the usual forms of seeking redress? Can Britain run away like a private malefactor, so that we cannot catch her to punish her? We should at least be better prepared for war. If the reasons for it are strong, they will not suffer by our taking time to examine them. Are we afraid that passion will cool, which we here avow as the principle which governs, and ought to govern our counsels? Or are we apprehensive that passion on this occasion is popular? I suspect this last idea has no small influence. We ought to judge that nothing will be popular which is not right. I have more respect for my constituents than to believe that they will run mad, and then become so myself to please them. That I should continue in this seat is of very small importance to me, and of none to the public. But it is of infinite moment to preserve our peace and national honor. The path of rectitude is the way to honor. The man who walks in it without deviating, will generally meet the public approbation. But if he should fail in this, his own feelings will reward him.

I respect the manly Republicanism of America too much to believe that the popular water-gruel, the milk for sucklings, with which some men strive to gain his favor, can either please his appetite or invigorate his system. There are discontented men in all countries; perhaps our own has fewer than any other. They halloo loud and often, and we are therefore led to think they are numerous. A tumultuous minority thus often imposes measures on a peaceful majority against the first principle of Republicanism. The voice of the people is not for war, unless necessary for our safety and honor. Many in this city may wish for it, but the majority through the Union are desirous of peace. Though they will encounter war bravely, if it shall overtake them, they are against running to meet it. I will not detain the subject ourselves to, the difficulty of obtaining supplies from other countries during the convulsions of Europe, the loss of our articles of export, perishing on our hands from a retaliatory prohibition by Britain, the impossibility of executing such a law, or the encouraging of frauds, to the ruin of the merchant of honor. These have already been the subjects of observation. The strong objection which arises from our Constitution I cannot omit. In the distribution of power to the several departments of Government, the right of making treaties is given to the Executive. Of course the preparatory negotiation must belong to them as an incident of the authority. But we are now commencing a negotiation ourselves, and prescribing terms of a treaty. It is urged that this cannot bind the Executive. They may make a different treaty, but our prohibition will still be in force. Do we intend to say, then, that we will forbid our citizens from commerce with Britain, even after the Executive, the only Constitutional power, shall have settled all matters of difference, unless they will suffer us to dictate the mode in which they shall exercise their authority? This looks to me very much like usurpation, by whatever name we may choose to call it. It has been said, by a zealous friend of the measure, that a treaty would be the supreme law of the land, by virtue of the Constitution, and therefore would repeal this law. Perhaps it may in future be thought convenient to retract that doctrine. If it be true, it is idle to make the law. But, sir, I doubt the truth of it. It appears strange to say, that an act in its nature Legislative, (and such we are told this is,) can be abrogated by an Executive act. I know of nothing but the Legislature which can repeal a law. It belongs either to Legislative or Executive power. If the former, the Legislature only can abrogate it; if the latter, we ought not to meddle with it. We may as well carry through the negotiation, as begin it, and prescribe the terms of it. If the Constitution had given us the power, we could not exercise it, from our numbers and mode of doing business. It will not be denied that the Executive has a right to appoint and instruct a negotiator as to the terms of settlement. Have we the same right, or even can we instruct him when they shall appoint? Suppose him thus doubly instructed by the Executive, having Constitutional authority, and by power, and the instructions contradict each other: whom is the negotiator to obey? None will say that the power of the Executive is not paramount to all others, as to treaties and all foreign negotiations. Are we to make a law, then, which may be violated with impunity—nay, more, with propriety? I wish, sir, that gentlemen who so often tremble for the sanctuary of Republicanism, and deprecate usurpation of power, would apply these excellent feelings to this subject. We have been often told that something must be done, and that, if we object to this measure, we ought to show a better as a substitute. I have never thought this a difficult task. I will now state the outlines of what ought to be done. By a peculiarity in our Constitution, negotiation with foreign nations is altogether an Executive duty; but to declare war is with the Legislature. In Governments where the powers of negotiation and of war are in the same hands, the same officer can demand a recompense for an injury, propose his ultimatum, and declare war if it be rejected; but our Executive may be embarrassed in pursuing a demand of compensation to the last extremity, lest he should pledge the honor of the nation to war against the will of the Legislature, who alone can make war. We ought, therefore, to pass a resolution requesting the President to pursue with energy a demand for recompense, according to the custom of nations, and pledging ourselves to support him, if the event should prove unsuccessful; and, in the mean time, we ought to prepare for war. I can see nothing further which is Legislative in its nature, or committed to our care by the Constitution, until it shall appear that the negotiation has failed of success. Then, sir, it will be time enough to prohibit commercial intercourse, or declare war, or take any other measures to avenge our wrongs and vindicate the honor of our country. If we are to engage in war, sir, I presume we must have some money to carry it on, unless in this instance, also, we are an exception from general rules. The measure now contemplated must almost annihilate our imports, and we have not looked round for a substitute. We have heard of a land tax, but there are many objections to it. On the eve of war public credit is doubly important. Having lost our former resources, we must provide new funds for the punctual payment of the interest of the Public Debt, the expenses of Government, and the innumerable expenses of war. We must not only suffer heavy taxes and burdens, but also an enormous increase of our Debt. As I am not guilty of being a creditor of the Union, perhaps I may be heard patiently on this subject. It has been often said here that the Public Debt has enslaved our country; yet now we are urged to increase it beyond all calculation, without taking the usual measures for pacific accommodation.

Though I have labored in vain to understand how the Public Debt is an engine of slavery, and have sincerely thought our country a perfect model of civil freedom, yet I hope this argument will have some weight with those who see that we are slaves, and that the Public Debt has riveted our fetters. Here give me leave to answer an argument which has been repeatedly pressed, and with apparent success. It is not denied that the first regular step is to demand a recompense for an injury; but it is said that Britain regards no laws of nations in her conduct to us, and therefore we are not bound to observe them towards her. I presume by this it is not meant that we ought to do wrong because Britain has done wrong; but that it becomes right for us to disregard those laws which she violates. Let us examine this. The laws and usages of nations have prescribed certain modes of demanding redress of a nation for an injury; those of necessity can only be applicable to an injured nation, for no other can need redress. Can it, then, be true that the moment a nation is injured, and thereby is placed in the situation for which, and for which alone, the rule was made, the rule ceases to be obligatory? A nation cannot be injured unless the Laws of Nations, with respect to her, have been violated. According to this argument, a very solemn rule of conduct has been established, which is never to be complied with—not by a nation which has not received an injury, because there is nothing to redress, and not by a nation which has been injured, because, with respect to her, the Laws of Nations have been violated by the aggressing nation, and this dispenses with the rule. This answer to an argument so much relied on is, to my mind, perfectly satisfactory. I call on the gentlemen to show it to be a fallacy. Our situation, sir, is not new, though our conduct may be so. We have seen Holland, when neutral in former wars, suffering similar injuries; they did not pursue such measures as we contemplate, though better prepared for war. Neither their interest nor their honor suffered by their moderation. The present neutral Powers of Europe are fellow-sufferers with us; yet we do not bear of similar impetuosity of resentment. In all wars neutral nations are abused in proportion as the Powers at war are strong and the neutrality weak. A stronger combination than the present, perhaps, never existed in Europe; and a neutrality can seldom be weaker. The principles of the present war are also peculiar; it is a struggle for existence. The unusual circumstances of it have compelled the French, with whom we are in friendship, not only to disregard our rights as a neutral nation, but to violate their treaty with us, though we have proceeded so far in friendship to them as to hazard our peace. Our merchants suffer severely from that nation; yet we are told that imperious necessity from peculiar circumstances, is an excuse. I say not these things to criminate that nation; they have been civil enough to apologise and promise recompense; but we have not received even good manners from their enemies. The public mind appears to have suffered little irritation from this cause, and it is far from my wish to excite any. My motive is only to show that this acquiescence in their apology proves our opinion that the present war is peculiar in its nature. Though we owe nothing but indignation to Britain, yet we owe prudence to our country and respect to ourselves. The present moment is infinitely valuable, and ought not to be trifled with. The present situation and disposition of Britain almost insure us honorable peace, unless we provoke war. We have strong evidence that war with this country is against both their interest and their wishes. Though the measure under consideration is not in itself hostility, and violates no law of nations, were we to stop here, yet a little reflection must convince us that it tends to war. It is placing our negotiation for recompense from Britain on so new, and to them so humiliating a footing, that their pride must revolt; thus national honor must forbid a compliance. They will say to our negotiator, no nation ever addressed another in this way. Suppose we have injured you: it is not possible for us to treat with you respecting retribution on these terms; it is not an offer of peaceful accommodation, but an affront, a challenge. This refusal to treat, which the mode of making the demand renders certain, will then be urged as a refusal to make us a recompense, and war becomes inevitable. Why, sir, should we be thus ingenious to avoid peace, and rush hastily into the tragedy of Europe? At such a moment we ought to pause and inquire what we can gain by war. We now possess every blessing for which other nations contend; we may lose, but cannot gain by confusion. The price of our present political happiness was not small; we are now eating the fruit of that tree which was watered with the blood of our fathers; yet we suffer the canker-worm of jealousy to feed on its foliage—the whirlwind of discord threatens to root it up forever. What attractions do we find in the desolation, the misery, the crimes of Europe? Their very virtues are shaded with horror; their rulers are the scourges of mankind; their business is oppression; their sport is violation; they trade in blood; the priests of Moloch offer daily hecatombs of innocent victims; they fatten on human sacrifices; our former friends are insane, or rather their patriotism borders on phrenzy; Europe is at war with all the feelings of nature; they blaspheme her rights; they laugh at her agonies. Can it be necessary, sir, to describe the happiness of our own country to show the contrast? We are so familiar with public blessings that we have almost forgotten their value. The voice of oppression is not heard. Our habits are the dwellings of virtue and domestic happiness; the laws of morality and of our country are revered; we profane not the altars of religion; we have realized the golden age of fable; we have practised Republican visions; in this moment of danger our minds should swell to the magnitude of the occasion; we ought to brave every danger to defend these inestimable advantages; but if we want prudence, we shall appear to want every virtue. I have now done with the question. The measure appears to me to threaten great mischief to our country. If this shall be realized, though I shall share in the common calamity, a review of my conduct will not upbraid me. We may look back, sir, across a deluge of misery which may overwhelm the country, to the happy shore of peace, which, perhaps, we now imprudently abandon. We may recall this moment as that in which we hoisted the floodgate of destruction. On such a retrospect our countrymen may say, you were the authors of these calamities, and you are responsible.

Non-Intercourse with Great Britain.

[April, 1794.]

Mr. J. Wadsworth said the path to be pursued

Non-Intercourse with Great Britain.

by this country, Mr. Chairman, is, in my opinion, a plain one, if reason and not passion be our guide. We have suffered injuries; our rights have been violated. It is our duty to seek reparation for the former, and to vindicate the latter. But war is a calamity of the extremest kind; it ought then only to be encountered in the last extremity; every thing possible should be attempted to avoid it; every thing should be avoided that will tend to increase the chance of its existence.

The plainest facts demonstrate that our case is not out of the reach of a remedy, by negotiation. A revocation of the instructions of the 6th of November, and the explanations which have been given concerning them, afford an assurance that whatever may have been the disposition of the British Government at one time, war with this country did not continue to be its purpose.

What is the inference from such a state of things? why plainly this; that we ought to make effectual preparations for the worst that may happen; that we ought to go to work in earnest, and with vigor, to put the country in a state of defence; in a posture for serious war; and in this position, we ought to make one more appeal to the justice, the good sense of Great Britain; but if the gentlemen will not allow me these expressions as applied to Great Britain, I will withdraw them, and say their interest. And if that fails, then, and not before, we ought to meet with decision and firmness the only alternative—war.

In the meantime, sir, we ought to do nothing that can prove an obstacle to the success of negotiation; we should not by any rash or intemperate measure make accommodation on the part of Great Britain impossible, without dishonor; we should not so act as to force her pride, to take side against her reason and her interest. If a war is to happen, unanimity among ourselves will be of infinite importance; if our course be such as to render it manifest to all our citizens that we have done every thing in our power to avoid the evil; that we have availed ourselves of all the chances of preserving peace, that we have done nothing that could destroy a single one of them, then we shall secure unanimity; then may we rely that every nerve of the country will be strained, every resource called forth to defend ourselves, and annoy the enemy; and here I trust I shall not be behind any man in exertion and perseverance. But if our course be such as to leave a doubt, whether the war might not have been with greater prudence avoided; a suspicion that it may have been precipitated by violent and premature measures, adieu to unanimity.

The arrival of the calamity awakening men's minds to its magnitude, and substituting the operations of reason for those of passion, will substitute censure for applause; condemnation for approbation; the Government will lose the confidence of the people as having been rash and inconsiderate.

Our efforts will be languid and feeble, our councils distracted and disjointed, and the least evil that can happen, will be an inglorious and disadvantageous peace; what worse may be in the womb of time, God only knows.

I call on those who hear me to shun this course. I know the temper of the people I represent. I have every day communications that show me their extreme disapprobation of any measure that can lessen the chance for peace. I therefore, with the greatest confidence, predict what will be their conduct on one, or on the other plan of procedure. I believe the temper of the citizens of the neighboring States is not materially different from that of the citizens of the State to which I belong. I presume it will not be understood that the citizens of the State I came from are willing tamely to submit to be ruined by the ravages of Great Britain. No, sir, they love peace, and will court it with warmth; but if war be unavoidable, they will not be behind their neighbors; they feel, and feel keenly their wrongs and injuries, and their resentments are strong.

I ask the warmest advocates for the proposed measure to form in their own minds a just estimate of the substantial value of unanimity, of the comparative faculties of the different parts of our country, for military exertions; they will not do ill to review the example of the last war.

For my part I am resolved, whatever may be the current of the moment, to bear my testimony against all measures of a tendency to destroy the prospect of peace. I consider the one under consideration as such a measure, and mean to make my opposition to it.

Let those who are bold enough to court danger to the country, stand distinguished to their fellow citizens, from those who, though resolved to be prepared for war, and to meet it with fortitude when it is inevitable, at the same time are resolved not to precipitate so great an evil. I cheerfully concede to the former all the glory; they will have all the responsibility of their enterprise.

I have thus expressed my real sentiments, not attempting to torture any man's arguments, or wound their feelings; and were I to indulge myself in railing at the British for their unjustifiable depredations on our trade, I think, sir, I could be as eloquent as other gentlemen who have gone before me; I believe it would be useless, and I forbear.

The Committee now rose, and reported the resolution to the House; which was ordered to lie on the table, and the House adjourned.

Tuesday, April 15.

Several remonstrances from citizens of the United States West of the Alleghany Mountains, whose names are thereunto subscribed, were presented to the House and read, stating their right to a free enjoyment of the navigation of the river Mississippi, and praying that the General Government will adopt such measures as shall be most expedient and effectual to secure the same from encroachments by the citizens or subjects of foreign countries.

Ordered, That the said remonstrances be referred to Mr. Lee, Mr. Orr, Mr. Pickens, Mr. Rutherford, and Mr. Montgomery; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House. Mr. BLOUNT, from the committee to whom was re-committed the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the headland of Cape Hatteras, and a lighted beacon on Ocracoke Island, in the State of North Carolina," made a report; which was read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

Mr. HULLHOUSE, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States, upon the final settlement of the accounts between the individual States and the United States; which was read twice, and committed.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you a Letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of His Britannic Majesty to the Secretary of State; a Letter from the Secretary of the Territory South of the river Ohio, enclosing an Ordinance and Proclamation of the Governor thereof; the translation of so much of a petition of the inhabitants at Port Vincent, addressed to the President, as relates to Congress; and certain despatches lately received from our Commissioners at Madrid. These despatches from Madrid, being a part of a business which has been hitherto deemed confidential, they are forwarded under that view.

UNITED STATES, April 15, 1794.

The papers referred to in the said Message were partly read.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House, to prohibit all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland; and the same being twice read, in the words following, to wit:

"Resolved, That, until the Government of Great Britain shall cause compensation for all losses and damages sustained by the citizens of the United States, from armed vessels, or from any person or persons acting under commission or authority of the British King, contrary to the laws of nations, and in violation of the rights of neutrality; and also, until all the posts, now held and detained by the King of Great Britain, within the Territories of the United States, shall be surrendered and given up; and until compensation be made for the negroes carried away, contrary to the Treaty of Peace,—all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, or the citizens or subjects of any other nation, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, shall be prohibited: Provided, such prohibition shall not extend to vessels, or their cargoes, arriving in any of the ports of the United States, before the — day of — next."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, presented his modification of the original motion. It was declared to be a substitute by the Chair, and therefore out of order.

Mr. GILES moved to strike out of the resolution the sine qua non condition, of restitution for negroes carried off.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., objected to the motion. He feared it would appear like an abandonment of the claim.

After some further debate on this amendment, Mr. FITZSIMONS suggested a substitute for the resolution to avoid the embarrassment of a specification.

Mr. GILES withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., moved to strike out a specification, and insert a clause more general.

After further conversation, Mr. TRACY expressed a wish for the previous question, under the impression that this is not a proper time for a final decision of the subject.

Mr. SMITH, of S. C., consented to withdraw his amendment until the previous question be put. After some debate,

The previous question was called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question, to agree to the said resolution, be now put?"

And on the previous question, "Shall the said main question be now put?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 53, nays 44, as follows:

[H. or R.]

Mr. BLOUNT; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House resumed the reading of the communications referred to in the Message of yesterday, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and went through the same.

Ordered, That the said communications do lie on the table.

THURSDAY, April 17.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to inquire whether any, or what further or other revenues are necessary for the support of the public credit; and, if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

THE EMBARGO.

The resolution proposed some days since, for the continuation of an embargo, was taken up in Committee of the Whole, Mr. SHERBURNE in the Chair.

Mr. LEE made a motion for excepting foreign bottoms from the operation of the Embargo. This motion was supported chiefly upon the grounds that the agricultural interest suffers by a general Embargo; that the chief intention of the Embargo is, to keep American navigation from the grasp of rapacity; and this end will be as fully answered under the operation of the amendment.

Against it, it was argued, that the distinction will excite a jealousy in the breast of our citizens; will tend to deprive us of our seamen, who will engage for want of domestic employment, on board of foreign vessels, and also strip us of some portion of our vessels, by rendering foreign bottoms much more valuable than American. It was also said, that one object of the Embargo will be frustrated by the amendment—the fasting of the British islands. Such a discrimination will render an Embargo, instead of an act calculated to repel an aggression, and prevent aggression in future, an encouragement to insult, by encouraging foreign trade in preference to American. The amendment was lost.

Another amendment was proposed, to enable merchants, under certain restrictions, to send dispatch boats to the West Indies, in order to comply with the forms requisite to lodge, within the limited time, appeals from the Admiralty Courts of the British islands. Several attempts were made to guard the provision, so that it should not be a means of evading the Embargo. This appeared, finally, not to have been done to the satisfaction of a majority; and, upon its being suggested that the renewal of the general Embargo resolution was a measure that did not admit of delay, and that the provision proposed might be considered at another time separately, the question was taken, and the amendment lost.

The original resolution was agreed to by a very large majority, and reported to the House, where it was immediately taken up.

It was suggested that Sweden, by treaty, is positively exempted from the operation of Embargoes, and that, if this be the case, France, Holland, &c., who have, by treaty, the privileges of the most favored nations, are also exempt, and they should be positively exempted in the resolution.

It was answered, that treaties are the supreme law of the land, and cannot clash with a resolution of Congress. However, it was conceived that the provision in the Swedish treaty is not altogether clear, and at any rate can only entitle them to carry away their vessels, but not to export our produce against our will; for, in that case, our every attempt to lay an Embargo might be baffled by those foreign nations. A proviso, however, was adopted, expressly excepting from the operation of the Embargo, nations exempted by treaty. Another proviso was then adopted, to enable merchants to send dispatch-boats to any of the West India islands, for the purpose stated above. The resolution was then agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the present embargo be continued, and every regulation concerning the same shall be in full force, until the twenty-fifth day of May next: Provided, That nothing in this resolution be construed as intended to contravene any rights or privileges arising out of treaty or treaties between any foreign nation and the United States: And provided, also, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized to permit the sailing of any vessel, for the sole purpose of lodging in the Courts of Vice Admiralty, in any of the West India islands, appeals from sentences or decrees of the said Courts, whereby vessels or cargoes claimed by an American citizen or citizens, have been condemned: Provided, That bond, with sufficient security, be previously given, that such vessel shall not, directly or indirectly, carry on any commerce whatsoever, during the voyage.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the Standing Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of Abram Trigg, complaining of an undue election and return of FRANCIS PIERSON, to serve as a member of this House, for the State of Virginia, made a report; which was read, as follows:

"That, upon examining the evidence in this case, it appears that, in the county of Lee, in the said State, the poll was closed, after due proclamation by the sheriff, at or about three o'clock, p. m.; that application was afterwards made to the sheriff to open the poll for several voters who appeared, which the sheriff refused. On recurring to the election law of Virginia, the sheriff appears to be vested with discretionary power to close the poll at any time of the day after three proclamations made, and no voters appearing. The committee are, therefore, of opinion that the election was conducted according to law in the said county."

"It appears that the sheriff of Washington county, in consequence of rain, adjourned the poll to the second day; and that, from the latitude of discretion vested in him by law, he was fully authorized so to do."

"No evidence having been produced in support o the charge that persons were polled in Washington county, who live in the territory South of the Ohio, and in Kentucky, the petitioner has abandoned that charge.

"The evidence, with regard to Montgomery county, being very voluminous, and in some respects contradictory, the committee have found some difficulty in forming an opinion in relation to that county. The following facts, however, appear to be well established, viz:—

"That Captain William Preston, brother, and agent at the election, of the sitting member, was quartered near Montgomery court-house, with about 60 or 70 Federal troops, of which he had the command; that, on the day of election, the said troops were marched in a body twice or three times round the court house, and paraded in front of, and close to the door thereof; that, towards the close of the election, the said troops were polled, generally in favor of the sitting member, but their votes were put down on a separate paper, and, after the election, at the comparison of the polls of the respective counties, were rejected by the returning officers; that some of them threatened to beat any person who should vote in favor of the petitioner; that one of the soldiers struck and knocked down a magistrate who was attending at the said election; that three soldiers stood at the door of the court-house, and refused to admit a voter because he declared he would vote for the petitioner; that many of the country people were dissatisfied with the conduct of the soldiers, which produced altercations at the election between the soldiers and the country people, the former being generally for the sitting member, and the latter for the petitioner, and terminated in a violent affray between them after the poll was closed; that some of the soldiers being afterwards interrogated why they said they would beat any man who voted for Trigg, replied, 'they who are bound must obey.' That, though it is doubtful whether any of the soldiers were armed at the court-house, yet it appears that, at the time of the affray, after the election, Captain Preston had a sword and dagger; and that, when the soldiers being overpowered by the country people, retreated to their barracks, some guns were fired by the soldiers towards the country people.

"The committee, on full consideration of all the evidence in relation to Montgomery county, from which the foregoing facts result, are of opinion that, notwithstanding the soldiers were not disfranchised of the right of voting, merely as such, yet their conduct, as well as that of their commander, was inconsistent with that freedom and fairness which ought to prevail at elections; and that, although it does not appear, from any other than hearsay testimony, that any voter was actually prevented from voting, yet there is every reasonable ground to believe that some were, and that the election was unduly and unfairly biased by the turbulent and menacing conduct of the military; and that the petitioner, who only lost his election by a majority of ten votes, has not had that fair opportunity of obtaining the suffrages of the people of that district, to which every candidate is entitled. The committee therefore, viewing the precedent as a dangerous one, and considering the inestimable privilege of free suffrage ought never to be violated by any military interposition; that the sitting member may have obtained a majority by improper influence, and that the petitioner ought to have a chance of obtaining a seat on equal terms, are of opinion that Francis Preston is not duly elected a member of this House."

In support of the reasoning and conclusion of this report, the petitioner submitted a paper, containing, at great length, his observations on the depositions and other exhibits connected with this case.

Ordered, That the hearing on the trial of the said contested election be proceeded on in the House on Tuesday next.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the 18th of March last, relative to an advance of money, requested by the Minister of the French Republic, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, April 18.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, to continue the present embargo on ships or vessels in the ports of the United States, bound to any foreign port or place, with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and the same being read, was agreed to.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The report of the Committee of the Whole on Mr. CLARK's resolution for a non-importation of British goods, was called up.

The consideration of it at the present time was opposed chiefly on the ground that an Envoy had been nominated by the Executive to negotiate with Great Britain; that the adoption of this resolution, at the present time, would be a bar to those negotiations, an infringement on the right of the Executive to negotiate, and an indelicacy towards that department; and that, since it leads to war, other measures should precede its adoption.

It was answered, that the Legislature have solely a right to regulate commerce; that this measure is strictly within the Constitutional duty of the Legislature; that, if there is any indelicacy in the clashing of the proceedings of the Legislature and Executive, the indelicacy is with the Executive, as the resolution—the object of debate—had been several days pending in the House before the nomination of an Envoy Extraordinary was made; that the resolution cannot lead to war, as we have a right, as an independent nation, to regulate our commerce, and will, on the contrary, be the best means of bringing negotiation to a happy issue.

After much debate, the question on taking the report up was put, and the yeas and nays being called for, were taken, and stood—yeas 57, nays 43, as follows:

Mr. BEATTY then proposed an amendment to the resolution as reported, which modifies it so as to provide that the intercourse shall be restored when the treaty is fulfilled, and reparation for the injuries suffered by our navigation is made to the satisfaction of the Executive. This, after some debate, was withdrawn to give way to an amendment from Mr. MANISON, which will make the proposition read, in substance, as follows:

"Whereas, the injuries suffered, and likely to be suffered by the United States, from a violation of our neutral rights and commercial interests on the part of Great Britain, and also from a failure in the execution of the seventh article of the Treaty of Peace, make it expedient that our commercial intercourse with that nation should not remain as extensive as it now is: Therefore,

"Resolved, That, from the — day of — next our commercial intercourse with that nation be suspended. The chief difference, it will be observed, between this proposition and the original resolution, is, that in this, it is not specified on what conditions the intercourse shall be restored; leaving therefore, to a future Legislature, when they are satisfied with the reparation which negotiation may procure from Great Britain to renew our commercial relations with that country. The opposers of the original resolution asked for time to consider the amendment, and it was ordered to be printed.

MONDAY, April 21.

Ordered, That the copy of the Laws of the Territory Northwest of the River Ohio, which accompanied the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES of the twenty-first of January last, be referred to Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. GREENUP, Mr. HUNTER, Mr. McDOWELL, and Mr. COIT.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the fifteenth instant, to prohibit all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, or the citizens or subjects of any other nation, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland; and the amendment and modification thereof, which was proposed on Friday last, being further considered and debated, the said resolution was amended to read as follows:

"Whereas, the injuries which have been suffered, and may be suffered, by the United States, from violations committed by Great Britain on their neutral rights and commercial interests, as well as from her failure to execute the seventh article of the Treaty of Peace, render it expedient for the interest of the United States, that the commercial intercourse between the two countries should not continue to be carried on in the extent at present allowed:

"Resolved, That, from and after the first day of November next, all commercial intercourse between the citizens of the United States and the subjects of the King of Great Britain, or the citizens or subjects of any other nation, so far as the same respects articles of the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, shall be prohibited."

And then the main question being put, that this House doth agree to the said resolution as amended, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 58, nays 88, as follows:

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, accompanying a statement of the cases of all claimants to be placed on the pension list of the United States, who obtained certificates from the Judges of the Circuit Courts signed as Commissioners, and also from the Judge of the District of Maine; which was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. TRACY, Mr. TREDWELL, Mr. BEATTY, Mr. IRVINE, and Mr. THATCHER; that they do examine the matter thereupon, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act allowing Lieutenant Colonel Tossard an equivalent for his pension for life," and, the same being read, was agreed to.

A memorial of the merchants and others, inhabitants of the town of Norwich, in the State of Connecticut, was presented to the House and read, praying that the most speedy and effectual measures may be adopted by Congress, to obtain restitution for the depredations committed on the property of the citizens of the United States by the subjects of Great Britain, under the authority of that Government.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the motion of the twenty-seventh ultimo, for the sequestration of all the debts due from the citizens of the United States to the subjects of the King of Great Britain.

Mr. FINDLEY, from the committee appointed, presented, a bill for the relief of Nicholas Riebel; which was twice read, and committed.

that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to encourage the recruiting service," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments; whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to the amendment proposed to the first section, and doth agree to the amendment to the fourth section of the said bill.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and report from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing the copy of a contract made with the Bank of the United States, transmitted pursuant to the resolution of this House of the twenty-eighth of February last; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the bill providing for the payment of the second instalment due on a loan made of the Bank of the United States.

SATURDAY, April 26.

The House proceeded to the hearing on the trial of the contested election in the case of the petition of ABRAM TRIGG, complaining of an undue election and return of FRANCIS PRESTON, to serve as a member of this House for the State of Virginia; whereupon,

Ordered, That the petitioner, on his prayer, be admitted to the bar of the House, to be heard in the support of the allegations of his petition.

The depositions and other exhibits, as well on behalf of the petitioner, as of the sitting member, being partly read, an adjournment was called for, and carried.

MONDAY, April 28.

ALEXANDER GILLON, from South Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat. A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the bill, entitled "An act to suspend the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandise."

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate recede from their amendments disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act to establish the Post Office and Post Roads within the United States," and do agree to the said amendments, with an amendment and modification of the same, agreeably to the report of the Joint Committee of Conference.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment and modification; and, the same being read, were agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate adhere to their amendment disagreed to by this House, to the first section of the bill, entitled "An act to encourage the recruiting service."

The House proceeded to consider the said message. Whereupon,

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendment

ing backwards and forwards, to the extent altogether of nine hundred miles, before he can be sure of obtaining a decision. It was admitted that considerable grievances of this kind existed, but to point out an effectual remedy seemed very difficult.

Mr. FRIZZMONS was of opinion that the House should endeavor to expedite this affair, if possible, as they had many other subjects on hand; and if they did not quicken their progress, he foresaw that, at the end of the session, a great part of the public business would remain undone. He therefore recommended despatch.

The Committee then rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, April 29.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate agree to the conference desired by this House, on the subject-matter of the amendment disagreed to by this House, and adhered to by the Senate, to the first section of the bill, entitled "An act to encourage the recruiting service," and have appointed managers at the said conference on their behalf.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resumed the hearing on the trial of the contested election in the case of the petition of ABRAM TRIGG, complaining of an undue election and return of FRANCIS PRESTON, to serve as a member of this House for the State of Virginia; and the observations, in writing, of the petitioner, on the depositions and other exhibits in the said case, being read, and the sitting member fully heard in his defence, the parties retired from the bar.

The House then proceeded to a decision on the said contested election; and—

Mr. TRIGG and Mr. PRESTON spoke, each of them, for some time, to the merits of the case. Mr. SCOTT then rose.—He declared that, of all the questions which had ever come before that House, the present was to him the most wonderful. To tell us that an election had been overruled by a party of soldiers, was indeed extraordinary. Upon such an outrage, it was most astonishing that the whole country did not rise, as one man, to resent and punish it. But, for his own part, he saw the matter in an opposite point of view. He could not, for his soul, discover the smallest pretence to set aside the election of Mr. PRESTON, nor could he comprehend or conceive upon what ground so strange a notion had been started. As for Captain Preston, brother to the sitting member, whose conduct had been so loudly excepted against, Mr. S. said, that his behaviour at the election was that of a sage: instead of the fire of youth, he had discovered all the moderation that could have been expected from the character of a philosopher. As to the introduction of soldiers at the election, he saw no harm in it. They had a right to be there, for they were equally entitled with other American citizens to give their votes in the choice of a Representative. The quarrel that succeeded was accidental, and did not affect the question before the House. Mr. S. was ready, and had long been so, to give his voice for dismissing the petition of Mr. Trigg. He had not the smallest shadow of doubt upon the matter. Mr. MACON was of the same opinion. It had been asserted that in this case the laws of Virginia had been violated. He would be glad to learn what law.

Mr. W. SMITH considered it as a very clear point that the election was not a fair one, because it was evident that the petitioner had not enjoyed an equally fair chance with the sitting member. It was true, that some facts in the petition had not been completely substantiated, but many had. The House had been told that hearsay testimony was unworthy of attention: but he wished to remind them that they were not, like a Court of Law, restricted to proceed upon regular proof, and not to go beyond the letter of it. They were entitled to hear and weigh everything advanced, and to form their opinion from the general conviction arising upon the whole circumstances. Some facts of the most unwarrantable kind had come out. Three of Captain Preston's soldiers guarded the door of the Court-house where the election was held. When a person, since examined as an evidence, wanted to go in, they stopped him with this question—"Are you to vote for Trigg?" Upon answering yes, they replied, "By Jesus, then, you shall not;" and though he was fifty-eight years of age, two of them laid hold upon him and cast him to the ground; when he got up again, he went off. Mr. S. said that there was a clear collusion between Captain Preston and the soldiery.

[Here Mr. PRESTON interrupted Mr. SMITH, by declaring that there was no such thing in the evidence.]

Mr. S. affirmed that there was. [The Clerk was then directed to read part of the examination of the witnesses, when the particulars above stated appeared in the proof.] and Mr. S. insisted that they contained a demonstration of collusive measures between the sitting member, his brother Captain Preston and the military. It was objected to Mr. S., on the part of the soldiers, that they had only said they could, not that they would knock down Mr. Trigg's voter. But Mr. S. considered this critical distinction as minute and trifling from the lips of a soldier in liquor. He did not understand its accuracy, and he imagined that his own nerves must have been as much affected by the could as by the would. Many of the country people had expressed much dissatisfaction with the soldiers. It was proved that when the fray began, Captain Preston had wished to have twenty of his soldiers there; and this hint was no sooner given than a person ran off, and immediately returned with a party of them.

Mr. SHERBURNE was for supporting the sitting member. He wished that the time of the House might not be squandered in an useless display of eloquence; it was, to be sure, very agreeable to the speaker himself, but at the same time very superfluous in regard to his audience.

[The Clerk was again ordered to read some

[H. OF R.]

Contested Election.

passages in the proof, as far as the behaviour of Captain Preston.]

Mr. W. SMITH then rose a second time. As a member of the Committee that had been chosen upon this subject, he was entitled to vindicate their report, of which he read some extracts very unfavorable to the behaviour of the soldiers. Mr. S. observed that Mr. PRESTON, in his defence, had been extremely profuse of his censure on the Committee, for doing what they considered to be their duty. Mr. S., referring to the observations of Mr. SHERBURNE, said that he was perfectly in order for defending the report of the Committee, because it was justified by the facts. Though the quarrel between the soldiers and the country people did not happen till after the poll, yet still it arose from bad blood before the poll began, and therefore a reference to it was strictly in order. Mr. SMITH said, that it was no part of his intention to injure the character of Captain Preston, who, when the tumult began, took off his sword and gave it to some person to hold. For this moderation Captain Preston deserved credit. But still Mr. S. considered himself as justified in opposing the election, since it was not conducted with that fairness, that regularity, and that equality of chances, requisite upon Republican principles. He read a quotation from Blackstone, as to elections: "What is it, but to cut Government up by the roots, and poison the foundation of public security?" He dwelt at some length on this idea, and on the peculiar impropriety of military interposition. He said Mr. PRESTON had only a majority of ten votes; and when the circumstance of sixty or seventy soldiers driving off the voters of Mr. Trigg was opposed to such a narrow majority, could any body call this transaction legal?

[At the words "ten votes," Mr. S. was twice interrupted; first by Mr. MACCLES, and next by Mr. S. SMITH, of Maryland; but he persisted in his assertion.]

He had stated facts: the premises were obvious. Shall the House suffer an officer, the brother of a candidate, to seize the door of a Court-house, and turn away the voters against his brother? It had been said that it was customary to collect his friends, and block up doors; but surely it was a very improper custom. The sitting member had said, that if his brother made any wrong step he should have been prosecuted in a Court of Law. Mr. S. did not mean to say that Captain Preston had committed any offence worthy of that. He did not perhaps imagine that he was doing any wrong at all. It had been asked—Was it possible that sixty or seventy unarmed soldiers could overawe two or three hundred people? He thought it possible.

Mr. S. SMITH, of Maryland, defended Mr. PRESTON. He said, that in forming an impartial judgment upon this question, various circumstances must be taken into consideration, besides the facts in evidence before the House. In elections in the Eastern States, the citizens met in small bodies, and they conducted the business with that order and decency which became the true Republican character. But it was the misfortune of the Southern States, that their citizens assembled in large bodies; the Electors of a county meet all together, before the Sheriff, and give their votes at the same time. Hence it appears, that an election in the Southern States is nothing but a nursery of superlative mischief. He said that he was somewhat surprised at hearing another member [Mr. W. SMITH] express so much resentment at an election riot. The gentleman had access to the history of a certain election, where the very Chancellor of a Court of Justice bred a riot in his own Much had been said about the enormity of knocking down a Justice of the Peace; and in the report of the affair, it was stated as if the Magistrate had been at the Court-house in his official capacity. Now, sir, said Mr. S., in this part of it the report is not fair. The Justice of the Peace was not there in his official capacity. He was there drunk, sir; and he gave the first blow, sir, to the man who knocked him down. Mr. S. had, by the first accounts of this election, been very much prejudiced against the election of the sitting member; but when he came to examine closely into the subject, he declared that he had never known an election in the Southern States where there was so little mischief. He was sorry, for the honor of his part of the country, to give this account of it to the Eastern members, but in point of common justice to Mr. PRESTON, they ought to be informed that a Southern election is quite a different sort of transaction from one of theirs.

In the evidence before the House, it had been stated that one person was seen at the Court-house with a club under his coat. But, sir, said Mr. S., I suppose that five hundred of my constituents had clubs under their coats; so that if this be sufficient for putting an end to an election, the Committee may begin by dissolving mine. If the Committee are to break up every election where persons were seen drunk, they will have a great deal of work upon hand, sir. In what way were elections for Southern members carried on? A man of influence came to the place of election at the head of two or three hundred of his friends; and to be sure they would not, if they could help it, suffer anybody on the other side to give a vote, as long as they were there. It was certainly a very bad custom, and must very much surprise an Eastern member; but it was the custom, and perfectly known to be so; and therefore it was very injurious to hold up the conduct of Captain Preston as a pretence for dissolving the election. The behaviour of that young gentleman, when insulted, had been exemplary. In the midst of a riotous mob he gave away his sword, that he might do no mischief in that way. This was a great instance of moderation and presence of mind. The aspersions cast upon the character of this officer Mr. S. regarded as highly unjust, and they might, if not properly taken notice of, be extremely injurious to his hopes of advancing in the service. Captain Preston had gone to the Court-house as a private citizen, and he had a right to be there. As to the menace of the soldiers, that they could knock down one of Colonel Trigg's voters, this was very different from asserting that they would do it. Were a man to have come up to Mr. S., in the street, and say, "I will knock you down, sir," Mr. S. would be for striking that man; but were he only to say, "I can knock you down, sir," the expression would be quite different. But, as to the affray that fell out after the election was over, Mr. S. asserted that, if the soldiers had killed all the country people, or the country people had killed all the soldiers, this had nothing to do with the merits of the election itself. And as to this quarrel, few young men had the temper of this young officer, [Captain Preston,] in ordering off his soldiers; so that instead of the censure of that House, he deserved their praise. At his age, Mr. S. would not have ordered his men off; and as to the censure on the military, inserted in the report, he did not agree with it. It would be a very fine reason, to be sure, to vacate a seat in that House, because one of the Electors had been seen with a club under his coat! Mr. S. was sorry to give such a description to the Eastern members, of the manners of his country; but he did so, that he might hinder them from being hurt at the facts brought forward in the evidence. He concluded, by reminding these members that it would be ridiculous to measure one thing by another, which was perfectly opposite, or to judge of a Southern by the customs of an Eastern election.

Mr. CLARK said, that three days had now been spent upon this business. Long speeches did not alter the way in which members were to give their votes, and they were therefore nothing but a loss of time; he wished for the question.

Mr. MACCLES said that there was no law to hinder the militia from attending elections. Mr. GILLON spoke for a few minutes. He saw no reason why another member [Mr. W. SMITH, of S. C.] should be so much hurt by the circumstance of an election riot. Referring to the speech of Mr. S. SMITH, he observed, that there was a riot at the gentleman's own election, and in his own favor; and still worse, this riot was in a Church: the riot was raised by a Magistrate, who, with his own hand, dragged one of the opposite party out of the Church. And if you want evidence of all this, said Mr. GILLON, I myself was present, and can be a witness. Mr. G. saw, therefore, no reason why there should be such a noise about this election in particular, when others were just as bad, or a great deal worse. The member [Mr. PRESTON] was duly qualified to hold his seat, and Mr. G. hoped that he would hold it.

Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. LYMAN, Mr. LEE, and some other members also spoke; but it is not necessary to go into further detail. The question was at last called for. Mr. AWEES proposed that the yeas and nays should be taken, but this was not done.

The petition of Mr. Trigg, and the report of the Committee upon it, were rejected, without a division.

And the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, April 30.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of the inhabitants of Post St. Vincennes, communicated by a written Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the fifteenth instant, made a report, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, or what, further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

INDEMNITY FOR SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. GOODRUE laid on the table the following resolution:

"Whereas, it is a primary object in the establishment of Civil Government, to protect the persons and property of its citizens from the violence of nations as well as individuals; and whereas many of the citizens of the United States have suffered great losses, by spoliation made on their commerce, under the authority of Great Britain, in violation of the Law of Nations and the rights of neutrality;

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the United States will guarantee an indemnification to all such citizens of the United States, whose property may have been captured and confiscated under the authority of Great Britain, in violation of the Law of Nations and the rights of neutrality."

At the same time, Mr. GOODRUE observed, that as the session was drawing towards a close, it behoved Congress to take the subject of the spoliation made on our commerce into consideration, and to quiet the mercantile interest of this country, by assurances that indemnification should be made for the immense losses they had sustained by British spoliation, to which, upon every principle of justice as well as policy, they were entitled. He had specified no fund from which the indemnification should be made, as he conceived we should be better prepared to do that when the result of the intended negotiation was known, than we were at present. He then moved that this resolution be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. SEDGWICK wished that the subject might be treated in the abstract, without any reference to collateral questions. He had not formed his mind on the subject.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought that the motion should be referred, not to a Committee of the Whole House, but to the committee that had already a motion of this kind before them, and likewise petitions on the same subject from various parts of the Union. He did not wish to go into the subject, till he knew the sentiments of the gentleman [Mr. SEDGWICK] on the mode of refunding to Government, which was not to undertake so great a task without a view to retribution. [Mr. N. seemed here to refer to the scheme of forcing Britain to refund.] If we engaged to pay these losses, referred to in the resolution upon the table, it was proper at the same time to secure a fund for the discharge of them. It was, no doubt, a very honorable idea to refund to the citizens of America the losses sustained in trading under her protection; but the principle laid down in the preamble to the resolution, extended very far. By the same doctrine, we should be bound to repay the damage committed by the Algerines, and by the Indians on the Western frontiers. Was the gentleman [Mr. Sedgwick] prepared to vote for making up the losses of the farmers in the back settlements, for all the murders committed on their settlements for a series of years past? That gentleman had been always opposed to retaliation, and Mr. N. could not consent to discuss the one resolution, unless he was assured that he was to be supported by the other.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, as to the present resolution, he had never heard of it till this morning, and so he could not speak to it. He was perfectly convinced of the propriety of discussing the resolution for indemnification, independently of any other question.

Mr. SMITH insisted that the resolution just now laid upon the table should be connected with a second, for securing indemnification to the American Government. By this he referred to the scheme of retaliating on Britain.

Some other members spoke a few words; and Mr. MADISON had then risen on this motion, viz: for a Committee of the Whole House on the resolution of Mr. GOODRICH, but he was informed, by the SPEAKER, that it had been just then withdrawn.

FORTIFICATIONS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill supplementary to "An act to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States."

The CLERK read a memorial from Annapolis, and

Mr. BOURNE moved that the Committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. HILLHOUSE objected to this motion.

Mr. FITZSIMONS thought it proper to fortify Annapolis; the expense was but a mere trifle. As to the Senate having formerly rejected this proposal, that rejection had not any weight with him.

Mr. MURRAY said, that the gentleman [Mr. Hillhouse] could not have heard the memorial from Annapolis, or he believed that he would not have opposed the bill. The memorial stated a number of facts, which arose from the peculiar circumstances of Annapolis. Whoever would attend to the situation of that city, would see that there were reasons existing for its defence which particularly applied. It was situated near the mouth of the Severn, and about the centre of the State—near the bay, and quite exposed to an enemy. That it would be easily fortified, was proved by the experience of the last war, when a fortification not only defended the city, but gave confidence to the navigation of the Chesapeake. At that time, the only fortified place in Maryland was the town of Baltimore, which, as being situated near the extreme parts of the bay, could not have furnished a place of refuge for bay-craft when pursued. The bay was often infested with privateers and gun-boats; and had it not been for the fortification of Annapolis, which was convenient to the navigation, many vessels would not have ventured out of harbor. All the experience of the last war showed the propriety of again fortifying that harbor. If that were done, the city would not only be secure, but a confidence would be given to the navigation of the Chesapeake; and this bay is really a Mediterranean on a smaller scale. Mr. M. said, that he believed he did not over-calculate the navigation of that bay by saying that one side of it—the Eastern Shore—had as many water-faring men employed, in proportion to the whole number of the inhabitants, as any part of the Union. Annapolis, besides giving occasional protection to vessels, was the capital of the State. As such, it was the depository of the Treasury of Maryland, of the records, in which the rights and titles to land of a great portion of its inhabitants were deeply involved, and it was the Seat of Government. To leave it defenceless, was to commit the peace, rights, and interests of the State to accident, and eventually to the confusion which would ensue from an attack on those objects of public care and attention. These considerations did not, he thought, apply to any other of the ports which had been struck out in the Senate, among which Annapolis fell, with others of small commercial character. He believed that the wishes of his constituents, and of the citizens of Maryland in general, were very much excited in favor of this measure; and he trusted that those who saw the peculiar situation and character of the city, would immediately perceive that there were a number of striking considerations that applied in favor of its defence, which did not so forcibly apply to the other small ports which had been omitted.

Mr. HEATH did not rise to controvert the remarks of Mr. MURRAY, but he wanted other towns to be comprehended in the bill. He proposed an amendment.

The Committee agreed to this bill by a large majority, and without amendment. The Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported progress.

Mr. W. SMITH next moved, as an amendment, that the PRESIDENT should be authorized to add any other places that he thought proper, to the number of ports and harbors to be fortified.

Mr. S. SMITH considered the amendment as unnecessary; and, after a short conversation, it was withdrawn.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

THURSDAY, May 1.

An engrossed bill supplementary to "An act to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States," was read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, or what, further or other revenues are necessary for the support of public credit; and, if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means.

Two resolutions were read: the first was, that five cents per hundred dollars be laid on every transference of stocks in the public funds; and the second, that five cents per hundred dollars be laid on the transference of stock in any of the other Banks of the United States.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that if this tax seemed too light, it was to be remembered that transferences were frequent.

Mr. HUNTER, of South Carolina, had a resolution of the same kind in his hand, but when hearing the others read, he preferred them to his own.

Mr. AMES, in a speech of some length, enlarged on the state of Public Credit, and the propriety and necessity of its being supported by Government, since it had once been adopted. This tax on the transference of the Public Funds tended to injure it, by sinking their value. When we next want to borrow, and shall go to market, the lenders will rise proportionably in their demands, and refuse a loan on the terms which they before accepted. Hence we shall lose, instead of gaining by it. Let gentlemen reflect on the consequences of unsettling all ideas of property, which must be the result of this proceeding. He was not one of those who despised the Funding System because it was unpopular, for it was the property of a Republic to set right above power. The Funding System had of late become a favorite topic of newspaper eloquence. As parties were inseparable from the nature of a popular Government, so this subject had been employed as an engine to render that of America an object of contempt and abhorrence. It had been loudly said, that the Representatives in Congress from one of the New England States had immense property in the Public Funds, when, in fact, their whole income from that source was not sufficient for buying oats for their horses. To say, therefore, that they were under influence in their political conduct from such motives, was the merest bagatelle that can be conceived; and the groundless jealousy that it has excited may be considered as a very strong counter-balance to the interest of those members who were the objects of suspicion. People dream that Congress are voting money into their own pockets. The propagation of this idea promotes the dirty purposes of slander, abuse, and falsehood. By such unworthy means, the blossoms of public confidence in Government are withered and blasted. This is more especially the case in the Southern States; and this dissatisfaction offers an apology for taking notice, in this House, of the abuse of newspapers. In the United States, taxation of the Public Funds is nothing more or less than the debtor taxing the creditor; and so questionable an expedient will recoil with tenfold force on the credit of Government itself. The progress of this measure would degrade the Public Debt into a paper rag. It had been complained of in this country, that foreigners had too great a share in the Funds, and Mr. A. was of opinion that it would be better if the money were all owing to American citizens. But, while things are in their present state, this tax would enable such foreigners to buy more debt out of the country and send less money into it in place of the debt. Public Debt is a ground which cannot be trod with impunity. We may soon, on such a precedent, go still greater lengths; a few events may force us to apply to the moneyed men, and then will be seen and felt the miserable termination of this policy.

Mr. CLARK said, that the gentleman [Mr. Ames] had made a long speech with respect to newspapers. What was his meaning, or what he referred to, Mr. C. could not tell; but he supposed that the gentleman had an intention of publishing his speech in answer to these newspapers. It was to be hoped that he would make it so that it could be understood. If it contained arguments, they were above his reach, and there he should leave it. He closed with speaking a few words on a proposal for taxing bonds.

Mr. LYMAN observed that, notwithstanding there were many objections against this part of the stamp duty, he was willing, if the whole report of the select committee was embraced, and the doctrine of stamps introduced, that the item now before the Committee should be blended with the others; but he had many doubts in his mind against the expediency of resorting to that source of revenue at this time, and hoped that other more convenient sources might be found.

Mr. BOURNE had no doubt of the right of Government to lay the proposed tax of five cents per hundred dollars on the transference of public funds. He saw no reason why that kind of property should be exempted from the right exercised of taxing other property. So far as the moral principle went, he was satisfied; and he had yesterday, on first hearing of this scheme, resolved to support it. But, in imposing taxes, we must consult not only morality but expediency; and here he had numerous objections to the resolution in its present shape. He wished to make it a stamp on every transference, without regarding the sum, because when it came to be a considerable sum, such as a thousand dollars, the duty would not be paid. The duty of five cents amounts, on a thousand dollars, only to half a dollar. He wished to make no distinction by specifying the transferences of Public Funds, but just to make it, at once, upon all transferences of money. By this reserve in expressing the intention of the clauses, the House would avoid giving any alarm to public creditors, and the matter would pass with little or no notice. But if the clause stood alone, in this marked way, the report might reach Europe that American funds were to be taxed, and the very sound of such a measure might do us more mischief than the object was worth. Mr. B. stated an error adopted in the old Governments of Europe as to taxing public funds. They had been taxed specifically under that title, which sunk their value. But a tax should have been contrived for property in general, that would have comprehended them without pointing them out in particular, which always sunk their value. Returning to the question before the House, he foretold with confidence that, if the tax were imposed without any reference to the sum transferred, there would be fifteen or twenty bonds, if the duty was moderate, for one upon the present plan, by which twenty shifts would be made before a bond would be employed. At the same time, he was satisfied that the right of Congress was equal to the taxation of public funds, as well as of any thing else.

Mr. TRACY objected to the imposition of a tax upon this kind of property. On this question he was at freedom to speak with perfect impartiality, for he had never once seen public paper till he came to Philadelphia, and he most certainly never owned a single farthing of it since he had an existence. The clamors, therefore, with regard to a paper interest, could not be applied to him. But, by giving this explanation, he did not mean to say that if he had been a stockholder he would have suppressed his sentiments. Gentlemen in that situation were just as much entitled to attention and confidence on this question as any other members. After this introduction, Mr. T. went on to state, that it was an act of injustice to tax the transference of public debts, for this reason, that a freedom of transference was part of the bargain between Government and its creditors. He had no verbose arguments on the subject. His objections were simple, and came at once to the point. A breach of bargain was a breach of honesty, and as such could never meet with approbation from him. We gave paper, said Mr. T.; transferability formed a part of it. Now, we come forward and say to the creditor, you shall not transfer unless you give up a part of your debt. He would have been very glad to vote for this tax, if he could have voted consistently with justice; but, feeling as he did, he could not give his consent.

Mr. NICHOLAS was of an opposite opinion from Mr. TRACY, as to the justice of the tax. He was convinced of that, as well as of its expediency. It had been urged that we should pay three or four times more in the next loan, in proportion, than the tax was worth, because, when the system of laying a duty on the funds was once begun, there was nobody could say where it was to end, and therefore every body would scruple to give us credit. To this his answer was, that the funds already borrowed could not be affected by this bill, because they were already in our hands; and, as to the future loans, in these the creditors had it in their power to make an express stipulation for no tax on their funds. This would answer the purpose completely, without recurring to those alarming presages of the loss of credit.

Mr. AMES, in reply to Mr. CLARK, said, that the gentleman had complained of his being unintelligible. With regard to the defence that he had made of the character of members, reported to be creditors in the funds, the style of newspapers, of pamphlets, and of debates in that House, altogether justified the propriety of an explicit vindication. He appealed to every member who heard him that, excepting only the debate on the adjournment of Congress, there had not been a single discussion of any length, for a considerable time past, where there had not been some pointed allusion to this paper bugbear. This Government, said Mr. A., has been painted as an object of suspicion and abhorrence. The gentleman [Mr. CLARK] complains that I am beyond his reach. He has made himself sufficiently intelligible, and has perhaps had his share in drawing such pictures. Recurring to the question before the Committee, he said that, when the Funding Act passed, no man will affirm that there was any notion of such a tax understood. No civilized nation can keep its credit while it taxes its public funds. Property is in general, to be sure, a fair object of taxation, but this tax cannot be levied with perfect equality; for it is beyond the knowledge of any Government; and, were it even within the knowledge of a legislator, still it is beyond his power. There was no way to get at an exact acquaintance with the universal state of property, but by cutting off people's heads and searching their repositories.

Mr. WINN wished to know who were the creditors in the public funds. Are they the original holders, the poor soldiers, who gave birth to this country? Or are they a set of men who have purchased the claims of these poor soldiers for a trifle, perhaps for half a crown in the pound? Surely, if this be the case, no creditor would grumble in paying the proposed tax on the transference; and if he should complain, was it tolerable to hear such a property held up as an unfit object for taxation?

On dividing the Committee, on the motion for a tax of five cents per hundred dollars upon the transfer of public debts, fifty-three members were in favor of it—the nays in the question were not counted.

The motion for a tax to the same extent, on every transference of Bank stock, passed unanimously.

A resolution for a tax on manufactured snuff and tobacco was next read. Mr. SCOTT rose and observed, that it was a home manufacture, and he did not wish to meddle with it, for that was a bad precedent. He should therefore move to strike it out.

Mr. MURRAY hoped, that the motion for striking out the tax on snuff and tobacco would not succeed. At a moment when we are looking about for proper sources of revenue, he thought that these objects came very aptly into view. They are articles that will bear a moderate tax, in particular the first. It is true, that a tax on snuff will not operate upon all men, but those who will be affected by it are well able to bear it. It will be paid by the wealthy, and it will be paid with the less reluctance, because its use is in a habit, which a man does not easily give up, and which, from its nature, can never be expensive. The quantity consumed by an individual is small, and the article itself is here extremely cheap. Formerly a pound of snuff was sold at the lowest at three-fourths of a dollar per pound. Snuff was now manufactured in this country as good as that imported, and is sold at a quarter of a dollar per pound. As to the objection that it was a tax on home manufacture, the precedent had already obtained in the duty on-distilled spirits. Mr. M. approved the principle of taxation that connected the payment with an enjoyment of luxury. The mind lost its repugnance in the pleasure derived from the article taxed, if the discharge of the tax preceded the gratification.

Mr. MACON observed, that the tax came to about four dollars per hundred weight, whereas the raw material itself cost about three dollars. This was, he believed, the first instance in the history of taxation where a raw material was taxed to more than its value. He was entirely against the resolution.

Mr. FINDLEY entertained an opinion that the resolution was in its principle enjoining, and could never be reduced to practice. People would raise it for themselves, as in fact a great number do at present. In the country, boys were suffered to raise a revenue on such resources? It never could be made productive, but it would ruin the manufacture.

Mr. S. SMITH, of Maryland, said that he believed his colleague [Mr. MURRAY] felt some delicacy upon this subject, and, making use of tobacco himself, did not choose to oppose the tax, from a desire of appearing disinterested. After some other remarks of an amusing nature, he stated that this tax went directly to the destruction of the staple commodity of three or four States in the Union. It was likewise, in another point of view, a dangerous precedent; for we should next go round all our manufactures, and every thing would be taxed; he was against the resolution.

Mr. FITZSIMONS considered the present as one of the best resolutions in the list. He did not know what he would have been more ready to propose.

Mr. SEDGWICK was of the same opinion. Mr. W. SMITH could not discover why tobacco might not be taxed, just as well as salt and other articles. We cannot step into a coach without paying a tax—why then scruple to tax other articles of luxury?

Mr. MURRAY, in reply to Mr. S. SMITH, said, that if he thought the tax would injure one of the staples of Maryland, it would be with great caution that he should support it. But he denied any such consequence. The price of snuff is a price annexed to the labor and ingenuity of the manufacturer, and not an effect of the value of the tobacco, which was very low. He did not believe that the price of tobacco was perceptibly affected by the home demand for manufacture, but altogether by foreign markets. Farmers use unmanufactured tobacco, and very little snuff. He still thought the principle sound, and that it was a capital object to render taxation light and easy to the feelings of mankind. To do this, if you incorporate the tax with some luxury to be enjoyed, you render it more pleasant by a natural association. There was, he thought, a similitude between this tax and that on distilled spirits. Each was a tax on a home manufacture; each was a tax on consumption. The duty in the present case did by no means bring down the sale of the home made article to a competition with the foreign article. Notwithstanding this tax, American snuff would forever undersell that imported, from its being twice, if not thrice, as cheap. For, even after the eight cents proposed on snuff was paid, the price would be extremely low. As to any opposition to the collection of the excise, a possibility which had been adverted to by some former speaker, he thought that no argument could be derived from that, which at once held up the folly of those who constituted the example. He did not fear that any class of citizens would be so riotous, so ignorant, so savage, as to resist the measures of Government. The enlightened freemen of this country would not tumultuously oppose a law made by legislators whom they had themselves chosen. He thought the tax easy, as falling on the more wealthy, and one which would by no means affect the staple of the country.

Mr. CLARK was against the resolution. Mr. S. SMITH agreed perfectly with the judgment of the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. FINDLEY], that the tax would destroy the manufacture, and raise nothing. Every body would use a kind of unmanufactured tobacco, that has a well known name, as there was no mention of that article in the bill.

Mr. AMES approved the tax, as one of the best which he knew.

Mr. MADISON had always opposed every tax of this nature, and he should upon all occasions persist in opposing them. If we look into the state of those nations who are harnessed in taxes, we shall universally find that, in a moral, political, and commercial point of view, excise is the most destructive of all resources. He did not say this, because excise had been a frequent topic of popular declamation. He was not guided by that, but he knew, and was sensible, that it produced almost in every case the most disagreeable consequences. Yet he admitted that the excise upon ardent spirits was a very natural expedient in the American Government, who saw such immense quantities of foreign spirits imported. Much of the collection of this tax on tobacco would depend on the oath of the manufacturer, and this was but another term for the multiplication of perjuries. The tax would therefore injure the morals of the people. He liked much better some other taxes in the list before the House, and recourse might be had to them. He should oppose this tobacco duty with every vote that he gave on the question.

Mr. AMES replied to Mr. MADISON, who spoke a few words in explanation.

Several members then requested that the clause might be deferred till to-morrow; accordingly, the Committee rose without coming to a division. The Chairman reported progress, and at three o'clock the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, May 2.

A memorial was read by the Clerk, subscribed by certain manufacturers of tobacco, in the city of Philadelphia, against a resolution at present before the House. [This resolution is for imposing a duty of four cents per pound upon all tobacco, and eight cents per pound upon all snuff, manufactured in the United States.]

PUBLIC CREDIT.

It was then moved that the House do resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider on the report of the Select Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GILES wished that a private petition might first be discussed, as it would take up only a short time, and then the House might proceed with the ways and means.

Mr. TRACY said, if we cannot proceed with dispatching business in a regular way, it will be much better to rise at once, and go home.

Mr. S. SMITH wished to delay the private petition because he intended, this day, to move, that the House shall meet to-morrow morning (Saturday) for private business, and then the petition could be discussed, without interrupting anything else.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that there was much business on hand, and if the House were to indulge every gentleman in requisitions of this nature, they never would get forward.

The motion for a Committee of the Whole House, on the Ways and Means, was carried—Mr. SHERBURNE in the Chair.

Mr. TRACY. If there ever was a luxury, snuff is one. If we are to excise at all, this subject is one of the best. It had been said, (referring to an observation made yesterday by Mr. SMILLIE) that taxes, which were paid imperceptibly, were more dangerous than others, because, by these invisible or imperceptible kinds of taxes, the people were seduced from thinking to what purposes their money went. Mr. T. could not believe that the member was serious in advancing such a doctrine; for the sum of it is, that, when taxes are to be raised, Government is in duty bound to give the people who pay these taxes, as much trouble as possible. There was nothing but this alternative—a tax on tobacco, or a land tax—which was equivalent to a tax upon necessities. Many of his constituents raise no more grain than was necessary to maintain themselves; so that, with respect to them, a land tax was a tax upon necessities. Mr. T. adverted to the weakness of complaining, because Government was attended with expense. People might as well complain as to the expense of fencing a wheat-field. Liberty, without Government, was worth nothing; it was a mere sound—and there never has been, and never will be, a Government that does not require expense. One circumstance recommended this tax—it was to be collected without any addition to the number of revenue officers. If it is true, as has been stated, that snuff has, in some of the Southern States, become a necessary of life, he would not wish to burden it. He next adverted to an assertion made yesterday, by Mr. SMITH, viz.: that this duty on tobacco, went directly to the destruction of the staple commodity of three or four States of the Union. He could not see that there was any danger of this kind. [Here Mr. S. SMITH rose, and said, that the assertion had been made, not by him, but by a member from North Carolina.]

The gentleman from Maryland had also expressed his apprehensions, that the tax might be augmented, till the culture of tobacco was exterminated. He [Mr. T.] could foresee no chance of any such consequence. If he did so, he should be sorry to support the resolution. He had no desire to crush an infant manufacture. Perhaps it would be found advisable to reduce the proposed duty; and, for this reason, he recommended to the Committee, that the number of cents per pound, in the resolution, should be left blank.

Mr. FINDLEY:—Ruin and depravity have always attended excise. It has been one of the principal sources of the corruption of Britain. The same effects must follow in America. He objected to the mode of taxation; and, besides, the tax is partial. It falls on the poor in cities. In the country, nobody will pay it.

Mr. SEDGWICK would vote against the tax, if he thought that it was contagious for public morality. But human nature has always been very corrupted, without the aid of excise laws. The State which he represents has been excited for two generations, and yet no bad consequence has arisen to the morals of the people. As to the corruption of Britain, described by the member who spoke last, he admitted that the account was just, but this was not to be traced to excise laws. They had been the subject of much clamor, but what in fact, was their history? A prodigal opposition rail at all the measures of a Minister whether they be good or bad, and an excise act is often one of them. In the course of political changes, these men get into place. But they do not attempt to take off the taxes against which they declaimed. In the mean time, the new ex-Minister harangues against the very taxes of which he was the author. As to this law being a source of perjury, oaths are necessary in impostu of all sorts. Why, then, object to them in this particular instance? Is an excise oath worse than a custom-house oath? There is often no other method of getting at truth. If we desert this way of raising revenue, what are we to do? Taxes cannot be imposed on personal income, with any sort of justice, because the actual degree of a person's wealth does not depend on the nominal amount of his income. One man has a thousand dollars a year; but such may be his situation, that the taxing him in so small a sum as ten dollars, may be distressing. Others, again, with only five hundred dollars per annum are, perhaps, in much more easy circumstances, than the former, upon whom the tax of personal revenue would press with superior weight. Direct taxes, Mr. S. regarded as of an improper nature. But, with regard to snuff and tobacco, nobody can ever feel the burden of a trifling tax upon them. If we are obliged to tax salt, why shall we scruple at taxing tobacco?

Mr. SMILLIE considered this measure as pregnant with serious consequences. He was opposed to every system of excise, because such systems had always produced mischief. If this were a despotic country, he could see a good reason for an excise system of revenue, because it was proper, in that case, to debase, by every possible expedient, the minds of the people, that their feelings might sink to a level with the meanness of their condition. But in a Republic, taxes should be of a different nature, and operate with a different tendency. As to what had been said by Mr. TRACY, he was quite serious in his conviction, that taxes ought to be raised in such a way, that the public might not only pay them, but at the same time, feel them. This would teach them to think a little better in what way their money goes; and then, and not till then, there will be an abridgment of the expenses of the Federal Government. How do gentlemen come to speak, as if there were no abuses in the present American Administration? Are there none? If the present tax on tobacco had been proposed by a Minister, Mr. S. would have been surprised at it. But he was somewhat amazed that this measure should be suggested by the Representatives of a free people.

Mr. AMES had a better opinion of Government than the gentleman who spoke last. He did not think excise a mark of despotism. He did not think the people stocks and stones; or their rulers knaves and fools. The member had spoke of the citizens of this country, as if to rouse their attention it was requisite to keep a flapper, like that of Gulliver, at their ears. In some States, perhaps, the public were stupid enough to require a flapper. In the part of the country which Mr. A. represented, there was no need of artificial provocation to keep alive the sensibility of the people to their rights. The gentleman had said that a Minister of State had no other object in view but to fleece the public.

[Here Mr. SMITH explained.]

Mr. AMES replied, that, whatever were his words, that was his exact meaning. It was perfectly understood, and was exceedingly unjust. As to the resolution upon the table, is there any comparison between a snuff tax and a land tax? Land is the great substratum of American prosperity. Difficulties had been started, as to the collection of excise; an oppressive law was a bad thing, but resistance was worse. Can any man think that a land tax does not open a much greater door to imposition than a tax on tobacco? In what way is a land tax to be laid, that can avoid inequality and injustice? Are we to tax the public funds, that last, and most desperate resource of national distress, and then to be told, that we dare not impose a duty on snuff and tobacco?

Mr. S. SMITH considered the observations of the member who had just sat down as amusing and ingenious, but they were not satisfactory. To him, it seemed a very odd scheme to crush American manufactures in the bud. Men of capital and enterprise advanced large sums of money in erecting snuff mills. After long exertions, they began to reap the reward of their expenses and their labor. At that critical moment, the Government souses down upon them with an excise, which ends not in revenue, but extirpation. In his opinion, the resolutions before the Committee comprehend very great injustice to the manufacturers of tobacco.

co. He understood that a snuff mill required a capital of five thousand pounds to begin with. We are going to impose eight cents per pound on snuff, which is double the price of the raw material. Here Mr. S. inferred, that it would be necessary for the snuff-maker to possess an addition of double his present capital; so that, instead of five thousand pounds, he must possess fifteen thousand, before he can begin, or support business. After paying so vast a duty, house-rent, the wages of journeymen, and a multiplicity of other disbursements, he is to give credit to his customers for six, nine, or twelve months. This was another hardship. He must keep accounts of his sale.

The words of the report, referred to by Mr. S., are as follows:

"He shall enter into bond, with sufficient security, to render a faithful account, every three months, of the quantity of tobacco or snuff sold or sent out, within that period. Previous to taking any tobacco, for the purpose of being manufactured, he shall notify the same to the Office of Inspection, and shall keep a book, in which shall be entered daily the quantity of tobacco or snuff sold or sent out in each day."

This regulation may often prove a very great hardship. It will require an extra clerk, at an expense of three, four, or five hundred dollars per annum. For the manufacturers of snuff, this might be practicable; but, at least in his part of the country, tobacco spinners are poor, ignorant creatures; many of whom cannot so much as read. How are they to keep accounts, or how are they to escape perjury, when you bid them do what they cannot possibly do? Besides, tobacco is frequently sold, not by weight, but by the yard. It had been said, that this tax was not more exceptionable than the excise upon spirits. This comparison did not hold.

By the tax on distilleries, the agriculture of the United States was greatly promoted. Land that would not bear wheat was, in consequence of that excise, and the encouragement at the same time given to this manufacture, covered with crops of rye. Hence, there was no just resemblance in the two cases. But if we are to excise every thing, Mr. S. said, that the Committee might excise, as properly as tobacco, those strings of onions, that were sent from Connecticut all over the Union. They were the staple of that State, just as tobacco was of Virginia, and were equally fit to produce a revenue. He fancied that we should next hear of an excise upon natils. Prohibitory duties had been laid for the encouragement of this manufacture in America. Progress had consequently been made in the business; and now there was nothing wanting but a smart excise duty to knock it on the head, under the pretence of exacting a revenue. Calico was another article that we should, no doubt, saddle with a stamp duty, as had been the case in Britain, where it produced a great revenue. In the case of the present tax, it would be said that the manufacturer must lay it on his customers. Yes; but will his customers advance him a capital double to what he had before? Besides the tax, he must have visits of excise-men, which are, in themselves, extremely troublesome.

* In the English act of Parliament, on this branch of revenue, there is a clause of the same nature, which has been converted into a dreadful engine of authority. The following circumstance respecting it is mentioned by the writer of the Political Progress of Britain. "An old woman in Edinburgh had been in the practice of supplying her neighbors with half-penny-worths of snuff. She was ordered, under a penalty of fifty pounds, to pay five shillings for a license, and she did so. Had she been able to buy from the manufacturer four pounds of snuff at a time, the matter might have rested there; but, as this was beyond her power, it was required by the terms of taxation, that she should make oath, once a year, to the quantity she sold. Her memory failed, and she is now, (1792,) with a crowd of other victims, in an Excise Court, which will, very possibly, bring her to beggary. This is like a drop in the ocean of excise. The very sound of the word, announces utter destruction: for it is derived from a Latin verb, which signifies, to cut up by the roots." The advantages of an independent press were fully proved in the course of this procedure. A true history was regularly published of the proceedings of the Excise Court; a sense of shame drove several of the judges from the bench; and this nuisance has since been greatly corrected.

Mr. NICHOLAS. We are going on exactly in the steps of Britain, of which this excise is one instance. That country once had a revolutionary spirit. How sunk are they now! Not one-tenth part of them dare to say that they are against the war with France, which is sweeping them with velocity over the precipice of ruin. At least, it is the common opinion in the United States, that their French war is the road to ruin. What has degraded and annihilated the spirit of Britain? Public debts, taxes, and officers of Excise. One-half of the nation has been loaded with the plunder of the rest. It is too much the American character to bear as right, what does not immediately hurt. It is a duty to keep the citizens alive to the operations of Government. It is somewhat strange to blame this attempt, when there is such an alarm, will put an end to the consumption of manufactured tobacco. Planters will make it ready for themselves. They can do so with very great ease by a method in the process of curing it. Mr. N. was therefore against the resolution.

Mr. DEXTER observed, that very few of the objections were confined to the question. Some were arguments against all excises; some against all public contributions; some against the nature and administration of our Government; and some against all Government. The statement of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SMITH.] that the duty would make three times the capital necessary, he said, could not be accurate. He had reckoned the cost of the raw material as the only capital employed. If this be true, as he states, tobacco at four cents per pound, and snuff is worth thirty cents per pound, it follows that the manufacturer makes 750 per cent. net profit. This cannot be true; the principal capital must be employed in preparatory works and labor of manufacturing. He added, that our having formerly protected the manufacture, is no reason against now taxing it; it would rather be a reason for calling on it to contribute to the public burdens. He said, the same gentleman asked, why there is no excise on beer manufactured in New England, as well as on Southern whiskey? I answer, beer is not manufactured there in any considerable quantity; if it were, it ought not to be taxed. New England rum is taxed enormously. The duty on this and whiskey are protecting duties to good morals. The use of snuff and tobacco is certainly a mere luxury, or rather folly; and all who use, and, of course, pay the duty, are volunteers. A land-tax, which is named as a substitute for this and every thing else, is a tax very unequal, and laid on all the necessities of life, and oppressive to the laboring poor.

It looks like Governmental rapacity, which is so deprecated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH.] He has more than once told us that insensible taxation is dangerous; and that we should make the people feel the taxes they pay; the way to make them feel taxes, is to lay those which will be most inconvenient. The argument, then, is, that the most inconvenient tax is the best. The very fact stated to reason from, is the strongest reason in favor of indirect taxation, viz: the burden is so small that the people do not feel it. What the gentleman's meaning is, unless it be that measures ought to be taken which may make the people dissatisfied with the Government, is difficult to say. The same gentleman has said, that all excises are against the spirit of a Republican Government like ours. It is strange, said Mr. D., that the spirit and letter of our Government should be so contradictory; for, by the Constitution, excises are expressly provided. The man who buys his food and clothing in small quantities, as he can obtain the means, does it much more easily than he could purchase a stock for a year at one time; and he who buys duties articles, and regulates his consumption by the price, pays his tax in small portions, with ease, when he would be distressed by being called on to pay the whole sum in gross annually. Mr. D. proceeded to say, that as to the fears of the gentleman above mentioned from Pennsylvania, and also of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS,] he had heard them too often to be alarmed at them. They seemed like a sale coat, made for any subject. He said, that a fact satisfied his mind on the subject. Massachusetts is a land of equality beyond any on earth. Scarce a man among them is rich enough to keep a coach, and scarcely one so poor as not to keep a horse; learning is more equally diffused there than in any part of America; their morals are so pure that crimes hardly have names; yet this happy race of equal Republicans never, since the institution of our Government, have sent one member here to whine or thunder about the aristocracy of our Constitution. He said, he would not compare this State with others in the Union; one man was not there disposed of at the will of another. As to the fear of the gentleman from Virginia, that excises would destroy American liberty, Mr. D. said, there was no danger of it. The character of individuals form the character of the Government. A people are never enslaved until they need a master. The American habits exclude all danger. That excises and slavery exist together in some parts of Europe is true; but it remains to be proved that one is the cause of the other. If we have the benefits of Government, we must pay for them. There was a time, said Mr. D., when laboring under the debility of disunion and the distresses of anarchy, we rejoiced that the people had instituted this Government. It is now represented, not as the guardian of liberty and innocence, but as the assassin of both. What has happened to change our opinion? Under its auspices we have increased in strength and riches; we are now free and happy, when the world is in confusion. The gentleman from Virginia seems to despise our present happiness, unless it can be eternal. Why, sir, should we expect this? Nations, like men, come to maturity; they grow old and perish. The sun must go out in darkness; the earth must be burnt up; nature must expire in agonies. What right have we to claim to be an exception from general rules? All nature is in perpetual revolution; we are a part, and must revolve with the whole. The system suffers, and probably requires constant re-novation. Succession appears to be a law of nature as universal as her works, and as immutable as her Author.

Mr. CLARK said, that the gentleman, who had just sat down, had put an end to all further necessity for discussion on this question. His panegyric on the character of his constituents, (the people of Massachusetts,) ascertained that they were undoubtedly the first people, and most enlightened republicans in the Union; and, as they would, no doubt, send the best informed persons among them to Congress, it followed that he [Mr. DEXTER] and his colleagues were the most respectable characters in the Committee, and that, therefore, the rest of the Representatives had nothing further to do, but at once give their votes as these gentlemen thought proper. Mr. C. sat down, with hinting at the waste of time, by speaking entirely foreign to the subject before the Committee.

Mr. NICHOLAS rose again. Because gentlemen did not adopt every measure of Government, it was said that they were enemies to all Government. The Federal Government never would have existed, if the people could have foreseen what sort of schemes it was to put into execution. In four years, there had been a complete revolution in the opinion of the rulers of that Government. He thanked God there was still as much principle in the people as would bring these gentlemen back to the point from which they set out. Mr. N. was highly offended at the style of the panegyric pronounced by Mr. DEXTER on his constituents, as if they possessed something about them superior to the citizens of Virginia. He understood that the member knew nothing about Virginia, unless by what he had seen of it upon that floor; and he trusted that he found nothing here that could authorize so derogatory a tone.

Mr. DEXTER rose a second time, and Mr. NICHOLAS made a reply.

Mr. SMITH. The people of Pennsylvania are as well educated, as intelligent, and as sound Republicans as any of their neighbors. As to the State of Massachusetts, we can only judge of it by the members whom it sends to this House. Mr. S. declared that he had not been able to trace, in their conduct, any superlative marks either of ability or of virtue. There had been funded, not only a debt which the United States, owed, but another debt, which they never owed. Had not these members supported this system? Was this an act that demanded the confidence and gratitude of the public?

Here Mr. CLARK requested to be heard. "I thought," said he, "that the question before us had been something about tobacco."

Mr. MADISON professed an aversion to all comparisons; but, if they must be made, it was proper to draw them with the strictest regard to truth. He agreed with the gentleman from Massachusetts lately up, that the citizens of that State were good Republicans, but so were the citizens of other States. Laws were fast equalizing the manners of Americans all over the Continent; and no where with more rapidity than in Virginia. The people there are not less truly Republican than others. There had not been a single insurrection in that State, since the first Declaration of Independence; nor any resistance to the laws. Excise had, indeed, been very unpopular in the Southern States, compared with what it was in the Eastern; but for this there was a very good reason. The tax was not only one to which they had not been accustomed, but it fell much more heavy upon the Southern than upon the Eastern States, where it was likewise familiar. The people of Virginia had never been discontented, even when paying heavy taxes, before the institution of the Federal Government, at the amount of taxes themselves. Their dissatisfaction arose from the knowledge that, at that time, but a small part of these taxes went into the Public Treasury. The Collectors, in raising the revenue, speculated upon a bad paper medium, and by certain manoeuvres, (which the member did not explain, but which are notoriously known) they turned the greater part of what they received into their own pockets. This was the only reason why the Virginians had formerly discovered discontent. As to the subject before the House, it was proper to choose taxes the least unequal. Tobacco excise was a burden upon the poor, upon the poor, upon the sailors, day-laborers, and other people of these classes, while the rich will often escape it. Much had been said about the taxing of luxury. The pleasures of life consisted in a series of innocent gratifications, and he felt no satisfaction in the prospect of their being squeezed. Sumptuary laws had never, he believed, answered any good purpose. Something had been said about the difference between direct personal taxes, and those raised by indirect means, such as excise and customs. He quoted an author of respectable character, in England, who estimated the expense of uplifting direct taxes in that country, such as the land tax, at three per cent, and that of uplifting indirect taxes, such as those of excise and customs, upon the whole, at thirty per cent.* This last was, perhaps, an exaggeration, and must be, in part, a conjecture. But such a conjecture proved that the proportion upon indirect taxes was at least very considerable. Excise had at first been resorted to upon a few manufactures. The dealers indemnify themselves at the expense of their customers. At the same time, they endeavored to evade the duties, and thus there commences a struggle, which has many bad effects, both upon industry and public morals. In Europe, when tobacco is excised, the Government forbids it from being planted. [Some years ago, the British farmers were obliged, by an act of Parliament, to pull up and burn their tobacco, before it was full grown.] No such measure, he hoped, would be adopted here, but it was hard to say where the subject might, one day, end. Statesmen, in general, do not study the liberty, the virtue, or the comforts of the people, but merely to collect as much revenue, as they can. Taxes are not, for the most part, the work of patriotism. An excise established in America would discourage the emigrations from Europe, that might, at this time, be so much expected. He was determined to vote against the resolution.

* Some years ago, the expense of collecting the revenues of Britain was about two millions and two or three hundred thousand pounds of Pennsylvania currency. The expense has since increased. Some taxes do not, in many parts of the country, defray more than half the charge of collecting them.

Mr. BALDWIN considered that we had only a choice of evils. Upon that principle he preferred a snuff tax to a land tax.

Mr. FITZSIMONS knew a time when the land tax of Pennsylvania cost thirty per cent. in collecting it; and, at the same time, the officers employed were more numerous than all the revenue officers of the Federal Government at this day, put together. Mr. F. stated the former to have been about two thousand.

Mr. GILLOX, adverting to some former speeches, did not rise to compliment that part of the country which had sent him to Congress. His constituents were men, and this single word implied that they had, like the rest of mankind, the common virtues and vices of human nature. As he had only been a few days in that House, he did not pretend to understand the present question of finance, so well as gentlemen who had devoted weeks or months to the subject. He was against both excise and a land tax. As to the clause of additional duty on the importation of manufactured tobacco, he feared that this was but a bit of gilding to cover a bad pill.

The clause referred to by Mr. GILLOX, is in these words:

"Resolved, That there be an additional duty of four cents per pound upon all tobacco, and eight cents per pound, on all snuff imported into the United States."

Is this the return to gentlemen who establish manufactures, that the moment the wheel is set agoing, it must be clogged with a tax? He warned the Committee to proceed in this matter with caution, lest they should excite a spirit of discontent in the country.

The Committee then divided on the question.

For the tax on manufactured snuff and tobacco 55, against the tax 34.

The Committee then rose. The Chairman reported progress; and the House adjourned till Monday next.

Monday, May 5.

A memorial of the sugar bakers of the city of Philadelphia, was presented to the House and read, praying that sugar refined within the United States may not be subjected to the excise duty proposed to be laid by the report of the Committee of Ways and Means now depending before the House.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom is committed the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, or what, further or other revenues are necessary for the support of the public credit, and, if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the remission of the duties on eleven hogsheads of coffee, which have been destroyed by fire," to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act directing a detachment from the militia of the United States," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. DEXTER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes; which was read twice and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Franklin, William T. Robinson, and Abraham Franklin: Whereupon,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized to direct clearances to be granted to any ships or vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, which are now landed, bound from any port in the United States for any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope, anything in the resolution for laying the embargo to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That, before the Collector of either of the districts of the United States shall grant clearances, or any such vessel shall sail, the owners thereof shall give sufficient security, to the satisfaction of such Collector, that she shall not unlade her cargo, or any part thereof, at any port or place, previous to her arrival at the Cape of Good Hope.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, and what, further or other revenues are necessary for the support of Public Credit, and, if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means.

Mr. TRACY moved that the number of cents per pound to be laid on tobacco, and snuff shall be left blank.

Mr. W. SMITH saw no reason for leaving out the specification. The duty was not too high. This amendment was in reality undoing all that the Committee had been about.

Mr. TRACY stated his reasons. He understood, that the duty on tobacco was too high, and that upon snuff too low.

Mr. GILKS said, that the price of the raw material was two cents, or two and an half per pound, and that so large a duty would altogether knock up the manufacture. He repeated this opinion, and moved that tobacco should be struck out of the bill, and snuff stand at eight cents. The reason of this distinction was, that the planters could with ease manufacture tobacco, so as to serve their own consumption, but they could not, so easily, make snuff.

Mr. FITZSIMONS apprehended, that it was proper the duty should be reduced; especially on tobacco. He, therefore approved the motion for leaving the duties blank.

Mr. SMITH considered the motion of Mr. TRACY as irregular. It had already been determined that the resolution should stand.

Mr. FITZSIMONS explained to him that the question decided upon Friday was, whether the resolution ought to be struck out entirely? It had been determined that the resolution should remain. But still, as to the quantum of duty, the discussion remained open to the Committee.

The motion of Mr. TRACY was agreed to.

The resolution was next read, for a duty of two cents per pound upon all sugar refined within the United States.

Mr. S. SMITH moved that the duty on sugar should also be left blank. Mr. W. SMITH considered this practice of leaving every duty blank, as reversing in substance what the Committee had been doing. The motion passed.

Mr. S. SMITH moved again that the whole sugar clause should be struck out. He was concerned in the manufacture of refined sugar; but he saw no good reason for giving a silent vote merely on that account. The land-tax will, in due time, come to be discussed; and there are very few members in the Committee, who are not landholders. But this will not prevent them from giving their opinions. He should, therefore, proceed to explain his sentiments on the present resolution. On sugar-baking he had for several years been sinking money. It was not till within the last year, that he made any profit by the adventure. The profits on this business were very precarious; and he had felt the full force of this disadvantage. The smallest inattention on the part of the person appointed to superintend the manufacture, was sufficient to render a whole baking totally useless; though it was frequently worth five hundred pounds; and he had twice met with an accident of this nature. He referred to the objection of Mr. DEXTER, where he stated that he (Mr. S.) had advanced as a fact that £5,000 of capital were necessary to prosecute the manufacture of snuff. In that five thousand pounds, he did not, as Mr. DEXTER had supposed, comprehend house rent, or the wages of journeymen, or the purchase of machinery. He meant to say, that five thousand pounds were essential for the purchase and the support of a proper stock of the materials of the manufacture. He would have given this explanation on Friday; but as the Committee had been much fatigued by the length of the discussion, he did not wish to controvert the position of the gentleman at an unreasonable time of day, when members were impatient for the question. He now declared his meaning, and he did this more particularly, that he might prevent any mistaken notion of a second assertion, which he was likewise going to make. This was, that in order to carry on the sugar-baking manufacture with advantage, there was required an active capital of fifty thousand dollars. This was exclusive of the expense of pots and pans, and the apparatus of instruments wanted for the actual operation.

These would demand sixteen thousand dollars additional. Even the fifty thousand dollars of active capital would not be sufficient, but a man who commanded fifty thousand dollars had likewise the command of an extensive credit in the banks of the United States. He assured the Committee, that in consequence of the two per cent. duty, the sugar-baking would require a double amount of capital, to what it formerly did. This assertion he illustrated by a variety of arithmetical calculations.

Thus, said Mr. S., when a man of property has adventured his capital, in establishing an American manufacture, you come down upon him with an excise. You tell him, in the style of the gentleman from Massachusetts, whom I do not now see in his place—[he referred to a part of the speech of Mr. DEXTER on Friday last] we have protected you for some time past, and we are therefore entitled to treat you in time coming, as we please.

Mr. S. argued, that this was no encouragement to a merchant to hazard his capital. Gentlemen would say, that snuff is no luxury; we shall not tax them. He considered this report on excise as the opening wedge. When once taxes on manufactures have begun, where are they to stop? He saw not, in the report, any notice of a drawback on the exportation of sugar manufactured in America. He had already fully explained his idea relative to an excise; and he should not therefore trouble the House any farther. One of the chief reasons for which he had risen at all was, that he had been misunderstood by the member from Massachusetts, as to the amount of capital requisite for the erection of a snuff manufactory. He was satisfied that this duty would end in the ruin of sugar-baking establishments.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—Since ever he had been in a Legislative body, he had been a friend to the manufacturers of this country. The gentleman who spoke last had not convinced him, that the two cents of duty would make a double capital necessary, or that the duty would demolish the manufacture. He was of opinion that the duty might be so modified, as not to injure the interest of the sugar-bakers. There would be adopted a proper mode of protecting the manufacture by non-importation duties; and it had been designed by the select committee to give a suitable drawback on exportation. He said, that raw sugars were at present but fifteen shillings per hundred weight. He did not reckon sugar a luxury. It was an ar-title of universal consumption. He pledged himself to the Committee that unless the excise could be placed on such a footing as not to injure the feelings and interest of the manufacturer, he would vote against it.

Mr. MURKINBERG (the Speaker) observed, that he was also engaged in the business of refining sugar, and therefore could, in some measure, speak from experience. The Committee, in laying these duties, had, as it appeared to him, contemplated a war; if that should take place, this fund would prove fallacious, because, during the war, a sufficient quantity of the raw material could not be brought into the country to support the manufacture. This had been the case in the last war, and whatever reliance gentlemen might have on the importation of sugar during a war, on the supplies furnished by successful privateers, that was insufficient and too uncertain to enable the manufacturers of sugar to proceed with such regularity as their business required. In short, it would, in a great measure, stop the business, and induce the owners to turn their capital, at least for a time, into other channels. He was also of opinion that refined sugar already bore too high a price, owing to the high price of raw sugar, which was much beyond what his colleague [Mr. FIZSQUON] stated, fifteen dollars per cwt., and that had already lessened the demand and consumption, which every one now concerned in the business could testify. If, therefore, two cents were added to the present price, it would lessen the consumption still more, and thereby materially injure the manufacture. He further observed, that owing to the probable capture of the French islands, sugars in England must be very low, and as that country paid but 8s. 6d. per cwt. on raw sugar and a drawback of 23s. was allowed on every cwt. of refined sugar exported, that operated as a bounty and enabled merchants to import it considerably cheaper than it could be manufactured here. This had been the case last year in the Southern States, and probably would be so again, unless a much higher duty was laid on imported sugars than the Committee at first contemplated. He then called for the reading of the memorial from the sugar refiners which was this day read in the House.

The memorial was read, and stated, among other particulars, that there were only seventeen sugar-bakeries in the United States. The tax was estimated to produce fifty thousand dollars; and this sum the profits of the business would not discharge.

Mr. FINDLEY said that seventeen houses were too small a number to protect themselves from the arm of the Legislature. He was afraid they would be crushed by their duty. The member went into some farther remarks on the bad consequences of this mode of exacting revenue.

Mr. SEDGWICK.—There has been much repetition in discussing this question. The member from Pennsylvania [Mr. FINDLEY] had said that seventeen sugar houses were too small a number to rouse a general sentiment in their favor. This was no argument at all. Everybody made use of sugar, and every one, therefore, was interested in having it as cheap as possible. As to the propriety of laying an excise upon manufactures, a large majority of the House have already declared themselves in favor of the principle in general. If there was only one sugar house in the United States, and only one inspection required for collecting the whole fifty thousand dollars expected from the tax, Mr. S. would like it so much the better. The drawback granted in Britain upon the exportation of refined sugar is, in reality, a bounty on the manufacture of the article. We must take care to add a large enough duty on the importation of it into this country, to counteract the effects of the British bounty; and this precaution will be still more necessary, as our American refined sugar will come higher on account of this excise. Much has been said, in the course of this debate, about oppression. What do gentlemen propose to make of this trite word? If they will reiterate their arguments on this question over and over again, what can be said to hinder them? If, in contempt of all experience, gentlemen persist in saying that an excise duty is paid, not by the customer, but by the manufacturer himself; and if, because the Legislature has authority to lay, when they please, any amount per pound on sugar, members argue against all taxes whatever, it is impossible to give them any satisfactory answer. We know that everything may be abused. We know that the Legislature have it in their power to lay a large amount of duty on every pound of sugar; we know, at the same time, that they never will do any such thing.

Mr. S. SMITH explained. He did not mean to say that the tax would be augmented to an unlimited excess upon any single article; but that taxes would be multiplied on all manufactures.

Mr. SMITH said, that things of this sort came on by degrees. Excise was at first light in England, and only on a few manufactures. It was then by degrees augmented, and extended over soap, candles, leather, starch, and an endless multitude of other articles. The cider tax continued as unpopular in England at this day, as it was when first imposed. He had no doubt of such an excise being introduced here; and if the people of England, so long familiar with heavy taxes, bore this excise on cider with such reluctance, the citizens of the United States would still less submit to it, and their discontent might be attended with dangerous consequences. Will not this set of resolutions for an excise, at present before the Committee, lay the foundation for an universal American excise? He deprecated the system in general. He did not lay the fault of its effects upon this or that Government. They were ingrafted in the nature of the thing itself. An excise, in its very outset, is a violation of the rights of freemen, independent of the extent to which it might or might not be carried, and whether it oppressed the manufacturer, or did not oppress him, by making his house liable to be searched at all hours, it violated the natural sanctuary of domestic life. It creates a number of artificial crimes; an additional code of laws must be invented in order to punish them; and this punishment cannot be inflicted without the ruin of American citizens, or neglected, without the ruin of American excise revenues. What mischiefs have not excise laws produced in England? It has been found necessary to form a new set of laws in which the British subjects have lost the protection of a trial by jury. Here Mr. S. read a passage on this subject from Blackstone, which is in these words:

"All trials of offences and frauds, contrary to the laws of the excise, and other branches of the revenues, are to be inquired into, and determined by the Commissioners of the respective departments, or by Justices of the Peace in the country; officers, who are all of them appointed and removable at the discretion of the Crown. And though such convictions are absolutely necessary for the due collection of the public money, and are a species of mercy to the delinquents, who would be ruined by the expense and delay of frequent prosecutions by action or indictment; and though such have usually been the conduct of the Commissioners, as seldom, if ever, to afford just grounds to complain of oppression, yet, when we again consider the various and almost innumerable branches of this revenue, which may be in their turns the subjects of fraud, or at least complaints of fraud, and of course, the objects of this summary and arbitrary jurisdiction; we shall find that the power of these officers of the Crown over the property of the people, is increased to a very formidable height. Mr. S. said, that he was not fond of troubling the House with long quotations, but the present came exactly to the point. A system of excise was contrary to the spirit of the Constitution of a free country, and in opposition to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. DAVENPORT declared, that he could not sit in silence to hear this sort of reasoning. Did the gentleman imagine that the present excise was to be imposed wantonly? Are we not in great necessity for money? There were but three objects of taxation, commerce, manufactures, and agriculture. The first had been pretty well burdened already. The luxuries of the second were now to be taxed; or, in other words, every man was to tax himself. He confided in the wisdom of the House, that this measure would pass. If this resolution were to be struck out, what shall we do next? Let us see another tax, and we shall choose between them. But no gentleman can show any expedient preferable to that before the Committee.

Mr. S. SMITH.—Raise that seven and an half per cent.; that will do. But people who object to a bad tax are not, therefore, obliged to find a better in its place. Any abuse whatever may be defended in this way. A gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEDGWICK] had said, that as there were only seventeen sugar houses in the United States, it was so much the better. So by this rule, it was no matter what degree of hardship was imposed on the manufacturer, provided that a revenue could be got by it. To show the Committee that he was not disposed to give wanton opposition to taxes, Mr. S. informed them, that the excise on spirits had put an end to a distillery which he had formerly set up. The building was now lying waste; and his whole expenses were cast away. But of this he had not complained at the time, and he did not complain now; because he was convinced that the excise on spirits was, upon the whole, of advantage to this country. For this reason, Mr. S. had submitted without reluctance to the ruin of his distillery, as from local causes, the excise had been ruinous to the distilleries of the Southern States. It was, taken all together, an advantageous measure, and he cheerfully submitted to his loss; but now he found they were to come back again upon him, and destroy his sugar house, which he thought somewhat hard. Mr. S. here adverted to a mistake that he had made in a former part of the debate. He had said, that it required about three pounds of unrefined sugar to make one pound of refined sugar. This was a mistake; the proportion of unrefined sugar was, he believed, less than two pounds; though concerned in the sugar baking, he knew nothing of it as a profession. He never had set his foot twice within his own house since he built it.

[Several members had adverted in the course of preceding speeches to this misstatement by Mr. S. SMITH.]

Mr. GOODHUE did not think that two cents per pound would destroy the sugar business.

Mr. NICHOLAS, having so lately trespassed on the patience of the Committee, had not intended to trouble them again. But the gentlemen who favored the excise system wanted to make it pass through the Committee with an éclat which it did not deserve. He expressed his aversion to excise in general, because it was, at best, from its essence, inseparably connected with vexation, the multiplication of oaths, of false informations for smuggling, and acquittances at an heavy expense from such accusations. The moment we begin an excise, that moment the mischief begins. The smallest modicum of this sort cannot be raised without oppression. Mr. N. adverted to the idea of making people not only pay taxes, but feel them. It was firmly his opinion, that direct taxes were the best, both as being the least expensive in the collection, and as tending more than any others, to keep the attention of the people strictly fixed on the way in which their money shall be expended.

Mr. FINDLEY spoke for a short time. Gentlemen might find a difficulty in answering arguments, and so call them repetitions, and declare them not worthy an answer. But it was impossible to deny, that excise was inconsistent with personal liberty, and the spirit of the American Constitution. Mr. FINDLEY went over several remarks that have already occurred in the course of this discussion.

Mr. W. SMITH observed that the general question of excise had been canvassed a few days ago, and therefore gentlemen employed their ingenuity to very little purpose, in attacking what had been so lately decided upon. If objections were to be made to every tax, and every sum of duty was to be left blank, what was the occasion for appointing a select Committee of Ways and Means? One gentleman insisted upon striking out of this resolution, another on the striking out of that resolution, till in short they would leave nothing at all. This proceeding reminded Mr. S. of a story in the fables of Phœdrus. A man, whose head was covered with black and grey hairs, had two female friends. One of them, who desired that he should have a youthful appearance, carefully pulled out some of his grey hairs, as often as he paid her a visit. The other lady, who wanted him to look like an old man, was industrious in pulling out the black hairs. Between their joint endeavors, he became bald. This, said Mr. S., by the time that every gentleman has done with plucking, we shall have nothing of the report left. It was needless to make reports, if they were to be thus destroyed. All the ways and means that had been yet presented, if we lay the land tax out of them, are little enough to serve for the appropriations already made. It is very easy to make plausible and ingenious objections to every thing. But plausible objections produced no money, which must be had, and had immediately, by some way or other. A gentleman [Mr. S. Smith] had said, that the seven and an half per cent of impost should be raised to ten per cent, and that this would be a proper compensation for laying aside the excise system. That was indeed but a sandy foundation to build such an assertion upon. He adduced a variety of other arguments to show the impropriety of this scheme of objecting to every thing. He pressed the Committee, in the most forcible and interesting manner, to consider what they were about, and what was to become of public credit, and national defence, if they refused to vote for the requisite supplies to maintain the one and the other.

On dividing the Committee upon the foregoing motion of Mr. S. Smith, for striking out the whole resolution, there were for the striking out 25—against the motion 35.

Mr. LYMAN voted for keeping in the resolution, but on this condition, that the sum should be left blank. He made a motion to this purpose.

Mr. SPOWICK.—If the sum of duty be struck out, it is impossible to determine what is to be the duty imposed on refined sugar imported from England. If the duty on importation be too high, then by driving foreign sugars out of the market, we give the American sugar baker a monopoly against his customers at home. On the other hand, if we lay too little duty on the importation of foreign sugars, the foreign manufacture will undersell that of America.

The motion was withdrawn.

The next resolution in the report was read, and is as follows:

“Resolved, That after the day of — every person selling distilled spirits or wine, for consumption out of their own dwellings; distilled spirits in less quantity than twenty gallons; wines in less quantity than thirty gallons, except in the original cask or package in which they were imported, shall take out licenses to authorize the sale of such distilled spirits and wines, and shall pay, annually, for a license to sell all foreign distilled spirits, five dollars; for a license to sell all wines, five dollars.”

The resolution passed the Committee.

Mr. CLARK then informed the Committee, that when they had got through the report, he had a motion in his hand which he intended to lay before the House. He read this motion. The substance of it was, that, over and above all duties imposed on the importation of foreign commodities into this country, an addition of ten per cent of extra duty shall be laid on all articles the growth or manufacture of Great Britain.

The next resolution is in these words:

“Resolved, That the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars be raised by direct tax, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, to be apportioned among the States, agreeably to the rule prescribed by the Constitution.”

A motion was then made by Mr. LYMAN for striking out this resolution. He observed, that this resolution was supposed to contemplate a land tax, as, in the abstract of the report, it was called direct taxes on land. This being the case, he should be obliged, from not only a regard to his constituents, particularly, but in a general regard to the whole Union, to make a motion to strike out the resolution. He said, that he had a different opinion on this subject from those gentlemen for whom he had the highest respect, and whose opinions had, on many occasions, fully coincided with his own. He should not now take up the time of the Committee in reconciling this seeming inconsistency, otherwise than by observing, that he supposed it must be owing to the variation of the tenure of lands in the different States; that whilst in some States the lands were pretty well distributed, and held in small parcels by those who cultivated them, in other States they were held in larger quantities and cultivated in a different way. A tax on them therefore, which in the one case might be considered unacceptable, would probably be less so in the other. However, speculative opinions in questions of this sort were but a feeble opposition to fact and experiment. To these he would pray the attention of the Committee. In this country, some of the States at least have made the experiment. It had proved oppressive, excited discontents, and even convulsed the Government. The experience of other countries did not furnish much more favorable arguments, if his recollection and information were correct, as he thought they were. In the Republic of Rome they never had a land tax. It had its odious origin under the tyranny of the Emperors. In France, they have no land tax. This, in that country, he was sensible, was complained of, but it must have been because the lands were held by the nobility, to whom it provided an exemption from the burdens of society, and from that cause the exemption was disagreeable to the people; but had the lands been of a different tenure there would have been no such complaint. How stood the case in England, a country where every species of taxation was carried to its utmost stretch? Their land tax was a mere trifle compared with their other impositions; and, trifling as it was, they embraced every occasion, when not pressed by particular exigencies, requiring the utmost exertions, to lessen it, from an apprehension of exciting uneasiness and tumult. Indeed he did not know but it might there be deemed a modified relic of their former slavish tenures. Under these impressions, and the consideration of the expense of collecting a tax of this sort, he hoped it would not now be resorted to. He supposed the Select Committee had made the report under apprehensions of more danger from abroad, than was said now to threaten us. We are now told that affairs abroad wear a more friendly aspect. He hoped it was the case; no one could wish more sincerely than he did, that it would prove so; but if it should not, neither he nor any American would, he trusted, be averse to any species of taxation necessary to our defence and protection, and to give the fullest operation to our whole force. He did not forget, that, in discussing the business of ways and means, it had been said, that all taxation was objectionable, and that a motion for striking out any part of the sum necessary, ought to be accompanied with a succedaneum. He would therefore suggest increasing the impost duties, foreign tonnage, or even the excise duties. The impost on many articles was not nearly so high as it might well be made; the collection could be made with little additional expense, and with great certainty. There need be no new officers. Interest, policy, every motive conspired to abandon this tax on land, and embrace one more easy and convenient. He said, as little as he wished to see the public debt increased, and nobody had a less desire of such an event, yet he would sooner prefer a small loan for the possible deficiencies of the current year.

Mr. SCOTT rose. Mr. CLARK was up at the same time. The latter gentleman, observed, that he had been up some time before, but he was so small, that gentleman could not see him. He did not object to a land tax, considered as such, but he had a temporary objection. Did gentlemen consider in what time of the session they were? The Union consists of fifteen States all different in their laws, and in their local circumstances. The land tax was a matter of infinite difficulty, and would of itself require at least a month to discuss it. He therefore wished that it might lie over.

Mr. HEARN did not take up much of the time of the House in general. But he rose to say, that there were many expedients more palatable than a land tax. Why not lay a tax upon all kinds of shopkeepers? This project had formerly been very popular in Virginia. Why was the selling of wine, &c., taxed at so small a rate as five dollars?

Mr. SCOTT then rose. He said that he was surprised at their calling this resolution a land-tax. He saw no such thing about it. It might be a poll-tax. He was informed, that it was mentioned in the preamble as a land-tax, but he was to look to the resolution itself, where he certainly saw no such thing. A land-tax must be very unequal. One man would pay as much for ten acres, as another for a thousand. He recommended, in preference, a general tax on property; no matter whether by land or water. The resolution spoke of the Constitution. He knew no notice taken in the Constitution of any such matter. He considered it as impracticable, without destroying the Constitution, and how it could be levied was beyond his comprehension. He did not concur with some gentlemen for whom he had a great respect (referring perhaps to Mr. SMITH and Mr. NICHOLAS)

3d Cox.—21

LAS) that invisible taxes were dangerous. He could see nothing of that, in order to make people happy, it was necessary to have a good in their sides. He could not imagine that American liberties must be in danger, unless American citizens are harassed by direct taxes. That the accounts published from the Public Treasury very fully showed the people in what way their money was expended, and the people had sagacity enough to know that whatever money came from the Treasury must be theirs. If they do not like the way in which they see it laid out, they will send to this place other men, who will do their business more to their satisfaction. He again adverted to there being no notice whatever of a word in printing the report.] Mr. SCOTT recommended a tax on the funds. All the countenance ever given to funding systems, in all the countries of the world, all the books that ever had been written about them, never could convince him that such a tax was unjust. He was firmly persuaded, that in the exigencies of a nation, all sorts of property should be taxed, because all sorts of property required to be defended. He was quite satisfied that all property should defend itself; that is, should pay for its own defence. He would cheerfully submit his own property to a general tax, were it even to half its value, if such an impost were necessary for the Independence of America.

Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. SPOWICK, spoke a few words.

The Committee rose without a division on the resolution. The Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, May 6.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled “An act for the remission of the duties on eleven hogheads of coffee, which have been destroyed by fire,” was read twice, and committed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled “An act directing a detachment from the Militia of the United States,” and the same being read, were agreed to.

Mr. CORBIN, from the committee appointed, presented a bill supplementary to the act, entitled “An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts;” which was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, “To authorise the President to grant clearances in the case of ships or vessels now loaded, and bound to any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope,” with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendment, and, the same being read, was disagreed to. Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendment depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled “An act to encourage the recruiting service," made a report; and, the same being read, was, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

Resolved, That this House doth adhere to their disagreement to the said amendment.

CLEARANCES TO CERTAIN VESSELS.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate recede from their amendment, disagree to by this House, to the resolution "To authorize the President to grant clearances in the case of ships or vessels now loaded and bound to any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope."

The message was read to the House, containing an amendment to the bill authorizing the President to grant clearances to any vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and bound to any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope. The amendment consisted in striking out the words in italics; which made the bill extend to all foreign ships.

Mr. S. SMITH said he hoped the House would not agree to that amendment.

Mr. FRIZZMONS, Mr. GOODRUE, Mr. CLARK, Mr. SWILKE, and Mr. BOURNOR, spoke each a few words.

Mr. MADISON was very indifferent as to the whole matter. The amendment made it worse than it was before. He would rather lose the measure than concur.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought that the amendment would open a door to all sorts of imposture.

Mr. S. SMITH said it was very easy to make amendments; but gentlemen should consider what they were about. American owners would be cautious what they did; but, as to foreign vessels detained in the harbors of the United States, the consequence was easily foreseen. They would be driven by stress of weather into any port in the West Indies. They will next, for half a joke, or a joke, at most, get a certificate declaring the ship unfit for proceeding to sea, and the cargo is then sold.

On a division—for agreeing to the amendment of the Senate yeas 33, nays 40.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Committee appointed to inquire whether any, or what, further or other revenues are necessary for the support of public credit; and, if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means.

The motion of Mr. LYMAN to strike out the clause relative to the land tax being under consideration—

Mr. SEDGWICK, and, after him, Mr. NICHOLAS, made various observations on the nature of direct taxes, as distinguished from those of a different description. The former gentleman observed, that Massachusetts and Connecticut resembled each other more closely than any other two States in the Union; yet the method of levying taxes differed very materially in the two States. From this, he inferred the difficulty of fixing a general system of land tax.

After having considered the definition of "direct taxes," as given by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. NICHOLAS,] and after commenting on the opinion of certain political economists, who held that all taxes ultimately fell upon land, and, therefore, that those which were imposed on it were direct, and all those imposed on any other subject indirect, Mr. S. proceeded to state his own opinion.

He said that, in forming a Constitution for a National Government, to which was intrusted the preservation of that Government and the existence of the society itself, it was reasonable to suppose that every means necessary to those important ends should be granted. This was, in fact, the case in the Constitution of the United States. To Congress it was expressly granted to impose taxes, duties, imposts, and excises. It had been universally concluded, and never, to his knowledge, denied, but that the Legislature, by those comprehensive words, had authority to impose taxes on every subject of revenue. If this position be just, a construction which limited their operation of this power (in its nature and by the Constitution illimitable) could not be the just construction.

He observed, that, to obviate certain mischiefs, the Constitution had provided that capitation and other direct taxes should be apportioned according to the ratio prescribed in it. If, then, the Legislature be authorized to impose a tax on every subject of revenue, (and surely pleasure carriages, as objects of luxury, and, in general, owned by those to whom contributions would not be inconvenient, were fair and proper subjects of taxation,) and a tax on them could not be apportioned by the Constitutional ratio, it would follow irresistibly that such a tax, in this sense of the Constitution, is not "direct." On this idea he enlarged his reasoning, and showed that such a tax was incapable of apportionment.

He said that, so far as he had been able to form an opinion, there had been a general concurrence in a belief that the ultimate sources of public contributions were labor and the subjects and effects of labor. That taxes being permanent, had a tendency to equalize and to diffuse themselves through a community. According to these opinions, a capitation tax and taxes on land and on property and income generally, were direct charges, as well in the immediate as ultimate sources of contribution. He had considered those, and those only, as direct taxes in their operation and effects. On the other hand, a tax imposed on a specific article of personal property, and particularly if objects of luxury, as in the case under consideration, he had never supposed had been considered a direct tax, within the meaning of the Constitution. The action was indeed directly of the owner, but, by the equalizing operation, of which all taxes more or less partook, it created an indirect charge on others besides the owners.

He said it would astonish the people of America to be informed that they had made a Constitution by which pleasure carriages and other objects of luxury were excepted from contributing to the public exigencies, which was undoubtedly the case if the reasoning of gentlemen who opposed the resolution was well founded. If the imposition of a duty on pleasure carriages was a direct tax, it must then be apportioned; but as several of the States had few or no carriages, no such apportionment could be made, and the duty of course could not be imposed. Such a construction was inadmissible, because it would exempt, in times of the greatest distress, the fairest objects of contribution from the imposition of any burden. If there was doubt, we certainly ought not to incline to that side, which at the same time it might compel the Legislature to impose grievous burdens on the poorest and most laborious part of the community, shall exempt the affluent from contributing for their objects of distinguishing enjoyment. This seemed not to carry into effect that doctrine of equality of which gentlemen said so much.

Mr. CLARK complained that members spent their time upon definitions, when business demanded an immediate decision. He objected to a proposal from Mr. SEDGWICK that the land tax should be agreed to, but should not take place until there was a prospect of war. He hinted want of time to discuss the question, and would have it laid aside for the present.

Mr. HILLHOUSE observed, that, laying a direct tax would doubtless be attended with many difficulties, but was not, in his opinion, altogether impracticable. It being, however, one of the most oppressive and unequal taxes, ought not to be resorted to but in the last extremity; that great caution ought to be observed in the first commencement of the business; and the system that may be finally adopted ought to have the most mature and deliberate consideration which the present stage of the session would admit of. As it was proposed that the tax should not take effect but upon the contingency of a war, it was unnecessary to lay it at this time, as Congress must convene before war could be declared; and the members of the House would be able, from the course of events during the recess, to judge of the probability of a war, and, if appearances should be threatening, would doubtless revolve the subjects in their minds, and gain all the information in their power, and come together much better prepared to digest a system than they can be at this time. The people, he believed, were fully sensible that, in case of a war, almost all the resources from which the present revenue is drawn would be cut off, and that there could be no other resort but to direct taxes. If the present was contemplated as a war tax, the sum of $750,000 would be wholly inadequate, and the cost of collecting that sum would be nearly the same as to collect $3,000,000; if we had no war, he was of opinion there were other sources of revenue sufficient to supply the present exigency, and that we ought not to resort to a direct tax. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would be stricken out.

Mr. DEXTER concurred with the two gentlemen who spoke last as to striking out the clause. He thought it an unnecessary incumbrance upon the other taxes agreed to, if it was intended to be postponed in its operation. He said a land tax was a tax on the laborious poor. If every acre is to pay the same tax, it must prove very unequal, as poor men generally live on the poorest lands, and must pay oppressive taxes. If the lands are to be valued, the delay and expense must be enormous. Lands increase in value very unequally in different places, and the proportion will be forever altering. He had been told that two thousand persons had once been concerned in apportioning and collecting the land tax of Pennsylvania. He said a question had arisen as to the meaning of the words "direct taxes" in the Constitution. Before a determination be had for or against them, it ought to be known what is the true meaning of this phrase. He said his colleague [Mr. SEDGWICK] had stated the meaning of direct taxes to be a capitation tax, or a general tax on all the taxable property of the citizens; and that a gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] thought the meaning was, that all taxes are direct which are paid by the citizen without being recompensed by the consumer; but that, where the tax was only advanced and repaid by the consumer, the tax was indirect. He thought that both opinions were just, and not inconsistent, though the gentlemen had differed about them. He thought that a general tax on all taxable property was a direct tax, because it was paid without being recompensed by the consumer. Suppose one mechanic art to be heavily taxed, and others not taxed at all. This, at first, will be oppressive; but the art being necessary in society, other arts must contribute to support it under the increased burden. The tax will, like any other expense necessarily incurred in the manufacture, be added to the price of the article; and this contribution to reimburse the manufacturer who advances it will make it an indirect tax, according to the idea of the gentleman from Virginia. If, on the other hand, all mechanic arts and all natural subjects of taxation are taxed by the Legislature in due proportion, this is a direct tax; because no such invisible contribution is necessary, as each has originally borne its proportionate burden. Mr. D. thought, that, if any mode of taxation be permanent, it will soon be equal. The most unequal imposition will, like a fluid, soon diffuse itself equally through all the proper and natural subjects of taxation. Mr. D. thought, also, that direct taxation ought not to be pursued by the General Government, except in time of war, because it is the only source of revenue for the support of State Governments and payment of State debts.

Mr. S. SMITH did not think that the sums in the report would be pressingly wanted, for, in the first place, he had no fear now of a war, and, in the second place, the revenues of 1794 would exceed those of 1793, from which the estimate of the Committee of Ways and Means had been taken. There would be a greater importation in the next Fall than in the last; because England was overstocked with commodities for export, and would be very glad to trust America. He said that English manufactures had been sold to America forty per cent. cheaper during this Spring than in last Fall. Twenty-five per cent. discount had been given for ready money, and fifteen per cent. for a good bill on London, at six months. These facts he knew. He rejoiced to think that the product of the excise now before the House would go to the destruction of the National Debt. He wished for a committee to report what had been done already in the matter of ways and means. He said that England would be glad to give credit to America, as she was at war with France, and her commerce had thence become so uncertain.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said that, if the revenue of 1794 were equal to that of 1792, it would alter his ideas of the land tax.

Mr. MURRAY thought it best to strike out the resolution. The resolution did not specifically hold out the idea of a land tax; but it was well understood that a land tax was its object. Any gentleman might hereafter bring forward this object, which was both novel and complicated. It was of importance enough to deserve a separate bill, and a distinct discussion. His general impression was at present against a land tax, and his difficulties arose from, perhaps, the crudeness of the plans which he had yet heard. Certain it was, that, when we reflected on the various value of land, in different parts of the Union, the perpetual fluctuation arising from progressive improvement in this great object of industry, and clashing of landed interests from these considerations, we shall find that there will be great difficulty in organizing this tax. By voting to strike out the resolution at present, we do not ultimately abandon a view of this object—the taxes already agreed to may be immediately formed into shape by a bill—we shall accelerate the public business, and not necessarily give up this tax. At present, he was against the tax on land, but would not say how he should be, if a system could be suggested that would remove the difficulties he at present foresaw.

Mr. W. SMITH differed from Mr. S. SMITH. There would be a deficiency of at least two hundred thousand dollars. Revenue would diminish for imports. It would diminish for exports. The expenses of individuals also would diminish. It had been recommended that we should not go into the land tax at present, on account of the difficulty of ascertaining it. He thought this a proper reason for going into it, that gentlemen might have an opening view of the subject, and be preparing their minds for its final discussion at some future period.

On dividing the Committee, on the motion for striking out this clause for a land tax, seventy gentlemen rose. The yeas were not counted. So the motion was carried.

Mr. GILES moved to strike out the following resolution in the report of the Committee of Ways and Means:

“Resolved, That, after the — day of —, every person keeping a carriage for the conveying of persons for their own use, shall notify the same at some office, which may be designated for the purpose, and shall pay annually, for a coach, ten dollars; for a chariot, eight; for any other four-wheeled carriage, six; for a chaise or other two-wheeled carriage, two. With an addition of one-fourth, where two carriages shall be kept by one person; of one-third, where three carriages shall be kept by one person; and of one-half, where more than three carriages are kept by the same person.”

On dividing the Committee, there were for the motion 33, against it 44.

Mr. W. SMITH next moved that the last paragraph of this resolution, charging an additional duty where two carriages are kept, should be struck out.

Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. LYMAN, and Mr. SMITH, were for letting the clause stand.

Mr. S. SMITH was for striking out the clause. He disliked the tax. In some States, there were no carriages at all. It had been noticed, on a former day, that there were none in Vermont or Kentucky. The members of these States were, therefore, voting for a tax on their sister States, which they were not to pay a share of themselves. This was one objection to the matter. Besides, this was a tax on population. A young man (said Mr. S.) gets a wife and a carriage to drive her to church in. You tax him. In due time, he has a number of children, and must have a second carriage for giving them an airing. You tax him. Thus, sir, you tax a person for doing you the greatest service that can be done you—for peopling your country.

Mr. AYES said it had been proved by the information from some gentleman that, in the Southern States, a carriage was not always a mark of wealth, but that it was a necessary article. He was for striking out the clause.

Mr. W. SMITH ridiculed the paragraph altogether, in very pointed terms. If we are to tax a second carriage, we may as well tax a second glass of whiskey, a second bottle of Madeira, a second hundred acres of land that any man possessed, a second looking-glass in his house, a second pinch of snuff, or a second quid of tobacco.

His motion for striking out the clause was carried—ayes 40, noes 33.

Mr. MACOR laid on the table a resolution for an excise upon porter, beer, and cider. He had no long arguments to advance on this head. He should state, as it arose in his mind, a clear principle of justice that dictated this resolution. In the Southern States, cider, during a great part of the year, would not keep. It was therefore distilled into brandy, and paid a duty. But it was not equitable that some parts of the Union should have cider and malt liquors, all round the year, duty free, while others paid a duty for almost all the liquor which they made use of. He would likewise move to repeal the tax on brandy made from cider, that, when the cider itself had paid a duty, it might not be overloaded by a second excise. His idea was very plain. If it could be accomplished without much opposition, he was satisfied. If otherwise, he should, on this, as on all former occasions, submit, with respectful silence, to the sentiments of the majority.

The Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

[H. OF R.]

WEDNESDAY, May 7.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled “An act for the remission of the duties on eleven hogsheads of coffee, which had been destroyed by fire,” was read the third time and passed.

The House, according to the order of the day, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled “An act to erect a light-house on the head-land of Cape Hatteras, and a lighted beacon on Ocracoke Island, in the State of North Carolina;” and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. PARKER reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which he delivered in at the Clerk’s table, where the same were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled “An act supplementary to ‘An act to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States,’ with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

THE PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to inquire whether any, or what, further or other revenues are necessary for the support of the public credit; and, if further revenues are necessary, to report the ways and means.

The Committee then took into consideration the resolutions of Mr. MACOR.

The first of which was that a duty of — be laid upon every gallon of malt beer and porter made in the United States.

It was negatived by a majority of 44 against 28. Mr. CLARK said, that if this resolution had passed, he would have laid some new ones on the table, for the taxing of negroes and twenty other things.

The second resolution was, that a duty of — be laid upon every gallon of beer or porter imported into the United States.

Mr. SEDGWICK said that there was already a duty upon it amounting to a prohibition; and little or none, unless when smuggled, came into the country.

Mr. S. SMITH was persuaded that the gentleman was mistaken. Vast quantities of London porter were sold in America.

Mr. MACOR said that, as the first resolution for excising malt liquors was rejected, he considered the second as falling of course.

The third resolution was for laying a duty of — per gallon upon all cider manufactured in the United States, and the fourth, which was connected with and dependent upon it, was, for withdrawing, if the third resolution passed, all excise duties now paid on distilling cider into brandy.

Mr. MADISON was against all proposals of this kind.

Mr. NICHOLAS approved of the resolution. To obviate the charge of inconsistency, he thought it better to bring a general excise on the people at once, and try whether they would submit to it, or not, than to endeavor to bring it on them by imperceptible degrees.

Mr. KITTERA. The present tax was evidently impracticable. We had been told [by Mr. NICHOLAS] that Massachusetts made rum for all the rest of the States. Another State manufactures peach brandy; so the one may serve as a balance against the other. A gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] had repeatedly told the House, that the tax on spirits was unpopular. It was not so in that part of the country (the district of Lancaster) which he had the honor of representing; nor did he believe that it was unpopular in general. The excise on cider never can be carried into execution. We have been told that every family in Virginia make their own. It is vain to hope that any man will be brought to levy the excise upon himself; in what way then are we to collect this tax, in case it were possible that the resolution should pass the House? We must import collectors, and we shall need almost as many as we have of landholders; as there is commonly a distillery in every apple orchard of Virginia. Viewing the whole resolution as one that must end in nothing, he wished to get rid of it as quickly as possible.

Mr. SMITH declared that the tax was unpopular in the country.

Mr. FIDLEY entered into the general consequences of an excise, which were, he was convinced, of a most destructive nature.

Mr. KITTERA replied, that this excise was not unpopular in the Lancaster district, a fact of which he must be permitted to say, that he had the best opportunities of judging. He believed that the excise was chiefly disliked on the Western frontier of the country, where the people were many of them emigrants, and who never had been accustomed before to a tax of this sort; but it was far from being disapproved in other parts of the State.

Mr. CLARK asked what the motion before the Committee was?

It was read by the Chairman, and proposed that a duty of — per gallon be laid on the cider manufactured in the United States.

Mr. CLARK then observed, that it was impossible to have conjectured, from the speeches of gentlemen, of what the motion before the Committee consisted. One [Mr. NICHOLAS] argues against all excise as oppressive; and that, the only way to make it universal was to bring it on by degrees. On this account, he votes for an excise upon cider. This is his logic. The gentleman behind me, said Mr. C., (referring to Mr. FIDLEY) is another enemy to excise; and he would also vote for this cider duty; only that he says his conscience won’t let him. Mr. C. closed his speech by declaring that such sort of arguments were entirely beyond his comprehension.

Mr. SEDGWICK. After what has appeared this day, no man ought to be astonished at any political inconsistencies. Gentlemen in this very Committee, but a few days since, had voted against a tax on loaf sugar, to be collected from the proprietors of seventeen sugar-houses, and this because it would be oppressive to those on whom it was immediately to operate; and yet, those very gentlemen who had then felt and expressed such strong sensibility, were now rising for the extension of the same species of oppression to almost every citizen of the United States. What, he asked, was the pretence for this apparent inconsistency? This very extraordinary reason was given for it. It would equalize the burden of excise in the different States. How is the fact? Massachusetts will perhaps contribute as much in excise on cider, as any State, certainly incomparably more than any to the South of this. What was her present proportion of contribution to the duties of excise? It was nearly two-fifths of the whole contribution of all the States. It was considerably more than double what was paid by the State of Virginia, although the population of that State was almost double to that of Massachusetts.

Mr. S. SMITH would have thought that this debate would have been proper enough had we been on the question of the repeal of excise laws. But as we are upon laying a tax on cider, he certainly thought this conversation should have been restricted more closely to that subject.

Mr. AMES observed, that there was not a single distillery of the kind referred to in Massachusetts, till after the excise law had been passed. They are at present numerous. It is strange that a manufacture should thrive so extremely under oppression, and that the more it was oppressed, the more it flourished. This statement, as to the distilleries of Massachusetts, demonstrated that the whole arguments about the bad effects of an excise were a mere delusion. The manufacturer is richer than he was before the excise was laid. Numerous objections had been advanced against it, from its ruinous consequences in another country, arising out of the privileges of excisemen, and their right of entering the dwelling houses of all people, at the most unreasonable hours. Every precaution had been adopted by the American Legislature, that they could devise, to prevent inconvenience to the citizens of the United States; and it was not fair to argue from the abuses in another country, which did not exist in our own.

The question was called for, and the resolution for an excise upon cider was rejected by a great majority.

A resolution was then laid on the table, for a duty of — per ounce on all articles of silver, plated ware manufactured in the United States. The question on this resolution was taken immediately and lost.

On a motion by Mr. SEDGWICK, the Committee then rose, and the Chairman reported progress.

After the report had been read by the Clerk, it was moved that the House consider the report of the Committee, and agreed to.

On the resolution being put, as to a duty of three cents per bushel upon sails, the House divided, and it was declared to be negatived by a majority of one vote. Several members insisted that there was a mistake in the numbering of the members, as one gentleman had come into the House after the SPEAKER had counted the votes in that part of the House where he sat. Several members, who had been in the majority, requested that the question might be taken over again, to avoid any thing like an advantage. At last, after a long conversation, it was agreed to take the vote of the House over again, when there appeared for the resolution of three cents per bushel on salt 41, against it 46.

The resolution for taxing carriages was then read. It was moved to strike out the tax.

Mr. S. SMITH opposed the tax. If it was to exist at all, it should be a tax on the making of carriages, but this he did not approve either.

Mr. MURRAY said, that he was sorry to differ in opinion from his colleague; but he thought the tax on pleasure carriages a good one, in our present necessities. His colleague thought it would have been more analogous to the other articles brought forward by the Committee, if the tax were designed to operate on carriages to be made in future; but he would remark, that the tax long since passed on all stills in the United States operated as this was intended to do. He confessed that the terms in the Constitution, direct and indirect taxes, had never conveyed very distinct or definite ideas to his mind; yet it appeared, as if we were now called on to act under a clear perception of both modes. It was absolutely necessary to get a very clear understanding of these terms. After all he had heard he still saw much confusion in the definitions. The idea which the Convention entertained in requiring the use of the term direct tax to be apportioned agreeably to representation, must have been definite. They must have annexed to these terms a mode of operation, sensible, just, and equal. The only species of direct tax, agreeably to the rule in the Constitution, must be a tax on all taxable property in the Union. When a deficiency of revenue occurred, and a direct tax was thought of by Congress, he presumed the sum being ascertained, an apportionment would be made agreeably to the Constitutional rule, and each State, or the property of each State, taxed up to its apportionment. As to a complete modification of this principle, he confessed he had not yet heard one suggested, and there would be a difficulty, he believed, in the attempt, that would long keep off direct taxation; at least, until public exigencies rose to a higher degree of necessity than at present existed. The motion to strike out this tax on carriages, is supported by the position that it is a direct tax; and being so, must, if it be carried, be modified agreeably to the rule in the Constitution. Either this position must be unfounded, or the Constitution must be construed to mean a mode of taxation unjust, unequal, and in its operation absurd. If this be a direct tax, you must apportion it. Consequence would have nearly as much tax on her as the State of Maryland, since she has but one less in representation. He was informed that in the whole State of Connecticut there were but two coaches; thus, then, the owner or owners of these two coaches would pay as large a sum as all the owners of coaches in Maryland would pay. The extreme inequality would show the injustice of such a tax, and of course the Constitution could not be construed to carry such a meaning; but he could not exactly see the difference between this principle of a tax on a coach and that of a tax on a still, as far as a difference of the principles of taxation was drawn from the Constitution. The still and the coach are things of use; the argument that the tax on stills was an indirect one, would equally prove the tax on coaches such. It was a matter of choice with the holder of both, to own them and to use them so as to draw back the tax, by making the use pay the tax in both cases. The spirit, if not consumed by the distiller, is paid by the consumer; and the coach, if hired, levies the tax on those who hire it. Where the division of labor and ingenuity is made, it is true that distilling is a distinct profession; but in many parts of the country the farmer, who has an orchard, distills his own fruit, and if a man of extensive hospitality consumes the whole of what he makes, his still and his coach are in the same situation as far as either is an object of Constitutional taxation. The extreme hardship and injustice that would attend the construction of the Constitution contended for, was convincing with him, that this tax could not be considered as a direct one. He believed the minds of gentlemen, who undertook to construe those indefinite terms, direct and indirect taxes as referrible to coaches and stills, were confused by the substantial difference that there appeared to be in the mode in which each was an instrument of ability; but the difference in the mode in which each was instrumental to profit or convenience, created no distinction as to the class of taxes under which each or either of them was to be referred by the Constitution. Besides, coaches and all those splendid vehicles, were evidences of a certain degree of property, as the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. AMES] had justly remarked; and, in a moment like this, when we are hunting through all the recesses of revenue which, at any time we had been accustomed to think of, it would be impolitic to tax the humble line of enjoyment and leave the more elevated one free.

Mr. S. SMITH said, that there was a difference, and a very great one, between a tax on stills and one on coaches. He himself had stills; but he had made no use of them for some years, and of consequence, they cost him nothing. But he must pay for his coach, whether it stood in the yard all the year round or not.

After a long debate on the nature of these taxes, the Committee rose, and reported the following resolutions to the House:

"1st. Resolved, That, from and after the — day of — next, there be levied, collected, and paid, upon the following articles imported into the United States, in ships or vessels of the United States, with an addition of one-tenth per cent. on like articles imported in any other ships or vessels, the several duties hereinafter mentioned, over and above the duties now paid, to be levied, collected, and paid, in the same manner, by the same officers, subject to the same penalties, and entitled to drawbacks, as the same articles are now subject and entitled to, viz.:

On boots, per pair, 25 cents.

On shoes and slippers for men and women, and on clogs and goshaws, per pair, 5 cents.

On shoes and slippers for children, per pair, 3 cents.

On millinery ready made, artificial flowers, feathers, and other ornaments for women's head dresses, and on dolls dressed and undressed, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On cast, slit, and rolled iron, and, generally, on all manufactures of iron, steel, tin, pewter, copper, brass, or of which either of those metals is the article of chief value, not being otherwise particularly enumerated, (brass and iron wire, locks, hinges, hoes, anvils, and vices, excepted,) 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On carpets and carpeting, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On leather tanned or tawed, and generally, all manufactures of leather, or of which leather is the article of chief value, not particularly otherwise enumerated, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On medicinal drugs, except those commonly used in dying; on mats and floor-cloths; on hats, caps, and bonnets, of every sort for women; on gloves, mittens, stockings, fans, buttons of every kind, buckles (shoe and knee) 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On sheathing and cartridge paper, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On all powders, pastes, balls, balsams, ointments, oils, waters, washes, tinctures, essences, or other preparations or compositions commonly called sweet scents or odours, perfumes or cosmetics, and on all dentifrices, powders, or preparations for the teeth or gums, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On gold, silver, or plated ware, gold and silver lace, jewelry, and paste work, clocks and watches, and the parts of either, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On groceries, to wit: cinnamon, cloves, mace, nutmegs, ginger, anniseed, currants, dates, prunes, raisins, sugar candy, oranges, lemons, limes, and, generally, all fruits and comfits, olives, capers, pickles of every sort, oil, and mustard in flour, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On all marble, slate, or other stone; on bricks, tiles, tables, mortars, and other stone, and, generally, all stone and earthenware, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On cabinet ware, and all manufactures of wood, or of which wood is the material of chief value, 5 per cent. ad valorem.

On carriages, and parts of carriages, 4½ per cent.

On all manufactures of cotton or linen, or of muslin; of cotton and linen, or of which cotton or linen is the material of chief value, being printed, stained, or colored, 2½ per cent.

On all goods, wares, and merchandise, which now pay a duty of 7½ per cent. an addition of ¼ per cent.

On coffee, per pound, 1 cent.

On cocoa, per pound, 2 cents.

On cheese, per pound, 3 cents.

On the tonnage of ships or vessels of the United States, employed in foreign trade, 6 cents per ton.

On all foreign ships or vessels, 25 cents per ton.

"2d. Resolved, That after the — day of — every person keeping a carriage, for the conveying of persons for their own use, shall notify the same at some office, which may be designated for the purpose, and shall pay, annually:

For a coach, $10.

For a chariot, $8.

For any other four wheeled carriage, $6.
For a chaise, or other two wheeled carriage, $2.
"3d. Resolved, That after the — day of — there be paid the following stamp duties:
Letters patent, issued under the authority of the United States, $2.
Exemplification thereof, $1.
Licenses, or certificates of admission of solicitors, attorneys, advocates, and proctors, in the Courts of the United States, $5.
Exemplification under the seals of the Courts, 50 cents.

Affidavits and affirmations, except those before the officers of the public revenue, those relative to suits pending in Courts, to be used therein, and those relative to criminal proceedings, 10 cents.
Deeds, except those otherwise particularly rated, 25 cents.
Charter parties, $1.
Bottomry and respondentia bonds, $1.
Apprentices' indentures, 15 cents.
Certificates of debentures for drawbacks, 20 cents.
Bills of lading, coastwise, except for vessels going from one district to another, within the same State, 10 cents.

Ditto, foreign, 20 cents.
Inventories of the effects of deceased persons, or for other purpose prescribed by law, except in cases of goods distrained, or in compliance of any agreement between two or more persons, 10 cents.
Bonds for the security of money, when the sum is above fifty, and not exceeding one hundred dollars, 20 cents.
Above 100, and not exceeding $50, 25 cents.
Above 500, and not exceeding 1,000, 30 cents.

Receipts for legacies, or shares of personal estate, in cases of intestates, where the sum is above 50, and not exceeding $100, 25 cents.
More than 100, and not exceeding 500, 50 cents.
For every further sum above $500, $1.
Not to extend to wives, children, or grandchildren.
Notarial acts, 25 cents.
On every transfer of the stock of the United States, at the rate of 5 cents for every $100.
On every transfer of bank stock, as well of the United States, as those established under the authority of the individual States, at the rate of 5 cents for every $100.
Letters of attorney, 25 cents.
Policies of insurance—
From one district to another, in the United States, 20 cents.
To and from the United States to any foreign country, for any sum exceeding $500, 25 cents.
For every further sum, more than 500, 25 cents.
For every sum of 2,000, or upwards, $1.
Probates of wills, and letters of administration, 50 cents.

"4th. Resolved, That, after the — day of — there shall be paid, on all sales at auction, (except in the cases of property sold upon execution, or by virtue of distress for rent or tax, or in consequence of bankruptcies, and legal insolvencies, or where there have been general assignments for the benefit of creditors, or in cases where ships and goods have been stranded or wrecked, or in cases of sales by executors or administrators, or of produce sold upon the land where it is produced) at the rate of one per cent.

"5th. Resolved, That, after the — day of — there shall be paid, upon all tobacco manufactured in the United States, — cents per pound. On all snuff, — cents per pound.
"That every manufacturer of tobacco or snuff, shall, on or before the — day of — make entry, with the officer of inspection of the district in which he resides, of the house or building, in which the manufacture is carried on; and shall enter into bond, with sufficient surety, to render a faithful account, every three months, of the quantity of tobacco or snuff sold or sent out, within that period.

"That, previous to taking in any tobacco, for the purpose of being manufactured, he shall notify the same to the office of inspection, and shall keep a book, in which shall be entered daily, the quantity of tobacco or snuff sold or sent out in each day.
"6th. Resolved, That there be laid an additional duty of — cents per pound upon all tobacco, — cents per pound on all snuff, and — cents per pound on all refined sugar, imported into the United States, after the — day of —.

"7th. Resolved, That, after the — day of — there be paid, on all sugars refined within the United States, two cents per pound.
"8th. Resolved, That, after the — day of — every person, selling distilled spirits or wines, for consumption, out of their own dwellings; distilled spirits, in less quantity than twenty gallons; wines, in less quantity than thirty gallons, except in the original cask or package, in which they were imported, shall take out licenses to authorize the sale of such distilled spirits and wines, and shall pay, annually:
For a license to sell all foreign distilled spirits, $5.
For a license to sell all wines, $3.

In the House a motion was made to amend the report of the Committee, by striking out the second resolution, in the words following, to wit:
"Resolved, That, after the — day of — every person keeping a carriage, for the conveying of persons for their own use, shall notify the same at some office, which may be designated for the purpose, and shall pay, annually:
"For a coach, $10.
"For a chariot $8.
"For any other four wheeled carriage, $6.
"For a chaise, or other two wheeled carriage, $2."
And on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 34, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Theodoras Bailey, Thomas Blount, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Abraham Clark, Isaac Coles, William J. Dawson, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, William Findley, William B. An adjournment was then called for, and carried.

THURSDAY, May 8.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on the headland of Cape Hatteras, and a lighted beacon on Ocracoke Island, in the State of North Carolina," with the amendments agreed to yesterday, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. S. SMITH presented a memorial from certain citizens of Baltimore. They recited the hardships which they had suffered from the British ships of war in the West Indies. They declared that the amended instructions from the Court of London, of the 8th of January, had been found by experience injurious and delusive. They trusted that Congress would secure the indemnification of their losses. They recommended a prolongation of the Embargo. Ordered to lie.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act supplementary to 'An act to provide for the defence of certain ports and harbors in the United States;'" and, the same being read, was agreed to. A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

THE EMBARGO.

The resolution proposed by Mr. SWIFT, for declaring the Embargo to be at an end upon the — day of —, was then read. It was next moved to take it up for a second reading.

Mr. GILES said that if there had been any reason for putting on the Embargo, he could see none that had since occurred for its being taken off. He recommended that the resolution might lie for a few days, till we should gain some further information.

Mr. SENDWICK stated the great inconvenience to which the United States had been put, in consequence of this measure, and the propriety of an early discussion of the subject.

Mr. S. SMITH was for a continuation of the Embargo. Excepting at Antigua, the ships of this country are seized as fast as ever; they were condemned at Jamaica on the 1st of April. Sixty American vessels were making their escape from Port au Prince, and were seized all together by the British. Jervis continues in the same style of conduct as the others did. It is better to keep our vessels at home than to let them go abroad and be taken. The ravages of the British had not been relaxed; and the Embargo should be kept on till the ships could navigate with safety; other nations have armaments at sea to protect them, but we have none; so the only resource is to keep our ships at home.

Mr. W. SMITH said that it would be improper to take off the Embargo, as to vessels for the West India. But, in regard to others, he thought that they might be suffered to go.

Mr. GILES said that, from what he had heard, (referring, perhaps, to what had fallen from Mr. S. SMITH,) he was more than ever convinced of the impropriety of discontinuing the Embargo. We had sent an agent to the West India. It would be wrong to take off the Embargo till we had at least some intelligence from him.

Mr. FRIZZMOS recommended a delay of a few days, till we should hear from some quarter further on the matter.

Mr. LYMAN was sorry that the resolution had been laid on the table. It would lead to an idea that the Embargo was to be taken off, and of this he had no conception.

Mr. HEISTER was of opinion that the Embargo subject should be taken up at a very early day. He saw no reason why it should be delayed at all. The question should be decided in sufficient time to let intelligence be conveyed to the extremities of the Union, by the common way, without the expense of sending expresses. It required thirteen days to send notice to Georgia; and if people did not receive positive notice that it was to continue, they would consider it as laid aside.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. BOURNE, and Mr. KITTERA, spoke each a few words. Mr. TRACY ended the conversation, by observing that the whole day would be spent in talking whether or not this subject should be taken up. This was mere trifling; put it to a vote at once.

The question was put, and the resolution was deferred.

For every sum of $2,000 or upwards, $1.
Probates of wills and letters of administration, 50 cents.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed that, in the present situation of our affairs, very considerable additional revenues were necessary for the support of Government, and to defray the expenses which had been, or were likely to be, incurred this session. He stated that the actual probable appropriations for the current year would amount to the sum of $7,694,217, while the revenues to meet them would not exceed the sum of $5,318,584—leaving a deficit of $2,375,633. But, as one of the items in the expenditures—viz: the million for foreign intercourse—would probably not be wanted, or, if wanted, might perhaps be borrowed, the committee had only stated the interest on that sum, namely, $60,000, which therefore left to be provided this session the sum of $1,435,633; and he was clearly of opinion that Congress ought not to rise until they had provided that sum. He was within bounds when he stated that sum as sufficient; for, if the million above alluded to (and which was destined for an object which the philanthropy of every member would urge the employment of, if practicable) should be wanted, and there should be any difficulty in borrowing it, (an event not impossible,) the House would regret the neglect of so interesting an object. The committee, however, calculating on helped to enable us to face the increased expenditures of the country, it taught us to cherish that state of things which was productive of such national blessings. But we could not flatter ourselves that the revenues of this year would be as productive as those of the preceding year; many circumstances would contribute to diminish them considerably, even if peace should not be interrupted; the very prospect of a war would cause a diminution of exports from Great Britain to the United States, and at the same time a diminution of consumption among ourselves. Prudent men, apprehensive of war, would retrench their expenses, in order to meet the diminution of their incomes, and to be better able to contribute their quotas to the public Treasury. The measures which have been discussed in Congress relative to a sequestration of British debts, and a suspension of all commercial intercourse, would, by destroying that confidence which has heretofore existed, unquestionably diminish our importations from that country, which principally furnishes them. To these circumstances might be added the derangements occasioned to the commerce of this port by the unfortunate epidemic of last Summer, to that of all the ports by the present Embargo, by the extensive spoliations committed on our vessels by the belligerent Powers, and the interruption occasioned by the Algerines to our commerce with the South of Europe. The Committee, taking all these considerations into view, had calculated on a defalcation in the revenue, arising from impost and tonnage for this year, of $1,300,000, and had estimated it at only $3,800,000; whereas that of 1793 produced $4,600,000. It had been proposed that, in lieu of these stamp duties, the duties of impost should be increased on all articles which now pay a duty of seven and a half per cent ad valorem to ten per cent, besides the increased rates of duties on the enumerated articles. It was not a little surprising (he observed) that gentlemen who, a few days ago, predicted an approaching war, whereby our existing revenue arising from impost would be almost annihilated, should now not only count upon the continuance of that revenue, but should expect further aid from that source; or that those who are urging a suspension of commercial intercourse should rely upon commerce altogether for revenue. He was decidedly of opinion that commerce was already sufficiently burdened, and that it would be as unjust as impolitic to add to the burden. We ought not to rely upon the proposed duties on the enumerated articles which, with the proposed increase of tonnage, constituted an item of near $400,000. This he considered, under present circumstances, a very precarious resource. With respect to the other new sources of revenue, being untried, they were uncertain; the House possessed no data by which any accurate estimate could be made of their product. Under all these circumstances, while, on the one hand the existing revenues would fall short of those of former years, and the new revenues were either precarious or uncertain as to their amount, and, on the other hand, our expenses were necessarily much increased, and were likely to be still further increased, he was confident the House would be sensible of the propriety of negating the motion. He was ready to admit that there would be some difficulty in carrying the tax into execution; but these difficulties were inseparable from the very nature of taxation. It required little ingenuity to discover them, and to apply to them all the common-place topics which were resorted to on these occasions. But he thought that, if the gentlemen would employ their ingenuity and inventive faculties in discovering such revenues as would enable the Government to face the present exigencies, they would render more service to their country than by embarrassing with objections, which were equally applicable to almost every species of imposition.

Mr. GILSON said: When this matter was under debate last, I offered a few remarks, with the more view to obtain the information that seemed to be wanted. How far we have been gratified by the gentleman who dwelt much on this mode of taxation, the House must know; for, instead of producing the calculations required, observations were made that were as little convincing as they were pleasing. I do not think that my few remarks merited the replies which they met with, from three gentlemen in particular; but, as they have condescended to pay some attention to them, I was about to follow up their mode of politeness, and not leave their remarks unnoticed, when my colleague moved for an adjournment. I will try to recollect them, and shall first repeat what I then proposed, that the gentlemen who had been very attentive to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means differed so much in their calculations and observations, that I was not altogether able to form an opinion. Some observed that the report provided sufficient funds for a peace and a defensive establishment; others asserted that it did not. Some were for establishing funds by taxes for a war; others were not. It was urged, that, if there was sufficient for the present demand, why press for unnecessary and odious taxes? Let us rather confine ourselves to peace taxes, than be making experiments on land taxes, direct taxes, or an excise. It has, on all sides, been agreed, that we had not leisure to qualify either of these three kinds of taxes; that we had better adhere to what was absolutely needful; go home and tell our constituents what we had done; but that, if a war ensued, they must prepare themselves for taxes that were now looked up to as the proper funds for the expenses of a war. By this means, we should not only obtain their consent, but their aid, in qualifying them. And it was well known that war cannot be declared but by the consent of the Legislature; that the President, ever attentive to the interest of his country, would, if he foresaw that war was approaching, soon convene us; and that, whilst we declared war, we were at hand to devise the means of pursuing it.

I could not agree with the gentleman who observed, what harm would it do to have a little surplus in our Treasury? It might be employed in paying off the principal of the Funded Debt. I then remarked, that our citizens did not expect to be taxed for that yet. Because it was well known that many of the holders of these securities had, as it were, already received a great part of the principal, by having bought the indents, at from two shillings to ten shillings in the pound. Thus, all, which they had paid less for than twenty shillings in the pound was, as it were, so much received of the principal.

Now, in these few remarks, what was there to cause the replies that I shall allude to? The last observation could not be meant to any gentleman on this floor; for, it could not be possible that I should suppose that any member of Congress had been engaged with the speculators out of doors, who could not hire expresses nor pilot boats quick enough to conduct their plans. Far be such an idea from me. The past and the present members value their integrity too much to avail themselves of aught that is interesting to themselves here. No, sir; I would rather suppose that every member entering these doors left his pecuniary interest behind him. Impressed with that opinion, how could I think to offend any gentleman on this floor, unless they mean to convince me that I am mistaken in that favorable opinion? If so, so be it.

Sir, I am not apt to be wedded to opinions, but, if I were not fixed before, I am now riveted in my opinion, that this tax is not only unnecessary, but is thereby also more odious. The gentleman before me, from Massachusetts, has, so far from answering my request on the Peace Establishment, entirely dwelt on the necessity and the propriety of a war tax. His volubility thereon proves to me that he is one of those who verily believe that there are already sufficient funds provided for all their engagements, else why not come forward with calculations and with proofs? Until he does that, sir, the censure he meant as to conjecture applies as fully to himself as to me, and his similes are far from being applicable. For, has he come forward with any of the calculations, or has any one else done it? No. Surely, then, my application is proper, and his censure of conjecture is improper. The simile, shall a farmer wait to sow his wheat and his rye until he is hungry, or shall we wait to lay on taxes until there is a war, have no affinity but in the highly cultivated mind that begot them, and merit not attention even to expose them.

Sir, you have done much. You have directed your harbors to be fortified, your army to be augmented, frigates to be built, arms and ammunition to be had, and you have already provided the means for completing these objects. You have done more. You have made provision for the payment of a million of dollars, to be borrowed, and to sink part of the principal; which loan is to be applied for the purposes of military preparation. You have sent a Minister Extraordinary to England, to negotiate in the matters that might cause an interruption of peace.

Then, sir, with all this, had we but continued the Embargo, with such exceptions as that our allies would not have been injured by it, I will be bold to say that we should have had no war, and our suffering merchants would have had restitution. Should a war ensue, our moderation and our forbearance will make us strong, because we shall be unanimous. That being the case, our resources will keep pace.

Thus, sir, this gentleman, with all his conjectures and smiles, has not flashed conviction to my mind that this tax is necessary. He has dwelt much on the majority binding the minority, and on his exercising his own judgment. He calls himself a representative for the majority. Can he be otherwise, whilst he represents all, which certainly includes both minority and majority? Sir, I always did, and ever will, aver, that we are the servants, and the people are our masters, who have employed us to guard their rights, and that submission to their will, properly expressed, is our duty.

A very respectable number of citizens have advanced their opinion on this excise, and many are averse to all excise taxes. We ask for proofs that any additional taxes are necessary. We obtain them not. Therefore, I say, that it is the wish of all our constituents to lay no taxes but what are immediately necessary.

Another gentleman of the same State, made some reply to my remarks that the taxes on cards, coals, &c., introduced as additional aids to the other taxes, fell short, and were no object. But as that gentleman made no calculations thereon, nor on any of the duties and taxes, I know not at what he aims, as he continued much on the strain of the gentleman before me. I therefore shall now approach my colleague, who is for every tax that has been proposed, except the one on a transfer of the public funds, and the additional duties on American tonnage. He to be sure, has made some calculations about defending towns, about duties on cards, and on coals, &c.

My colleague presses forward the present snuff and refined sugar taxes, and says that the one upon cards, to which I alluded, was trifling, an application that I should not have bestowed upon it, for it was that gentleman who proposed it. It was he who first spoke of it to me, and surely he did not mean me to support what was trifling. We all agreed that it would be productive. But, sir, I think I can prove that a duty on cards is not trifling, that it is equal, and that it is productive. Is it a trifling thing to encourage American manufactures, to amuse ourselves with the raw materials of America, to give our youths the opportunity of learning to shuffle and cut, and play tricks with American materials? Will it be a trifling duty, when we know that most are fond of them? I know not how it may be in some States, but I well know how it is in ours. The games produced by cards are amusements for rich and poor, high and low. Both sexes amuse themselves with these games. Thus they are an equal tax. Most people are fond of cards. The tax is not only an equal one, but none, I believe, will venture to say that it is not productive. If we knew what a tax on cards has produced, if we knew the quantity of coals imported, then, and then only, can we know their probable amount in taxation. A gentleman from Virginia is the only member who brought forward some calculations, and he required information from the Chairman: but, sir, I wish to trouble him a little more. He says, sir, that, if this excise tax on tobacco, snuff, and sugar is struck out, there will be a deficiency of $210,000. I have often heard of that gentleman's abilities, his assiduity in calculations. But, sir, it is to be lamented that we have not before us the exact amount of each duty, each impost, each tax, and tonnage, for 1793, the idea of what each addition will now produce, and the amount of the Civil List, descriptive. Then we can collect the amount of 1794. Until that is produced, and the documents and information which I have demanded are laid before the House, I retain my opinion, and therefore will now lay on the table my calculations, founded on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, and asserting that, if their printed statement is right, I cannot be wrong; but I hope my original view in this matter will be accomplished by my requests and calls on gentlemen to come forward with the exact state of our finances. This is what I have in view, and then I shall invite gentlemen to explanations on the lumping statement.

To general support for 1794 - $7,044,217
Deduct the sum to be loaned for Foreign Intercourse - 1,000,000
Balance as surplus for 1794 - 6,044,217

Total - 9,079,668

By estimation of the revenues to the end of the year 1794 - $6,618,584
By additional duties and tonnage - $992,500
Deduct tobacco and snuff - $100,000
Loaf and lump sugar 50,000 150,000

By supplies of revenue for 1793 - 842,500
By probable surplus of appropriation out of the revenues of 1793 - 500,000
Total - 9,079,668

By balance of surplus - 3,035,451

Exclusive of any surpluses similar to those of 1793, and on the new additional duties—The supplies supposed to be wanted are, if the $1,000,000 be borrowed, the interest thereon, at six per cent. is $60,000
If the addition to the military Establishment, provisional force, and expense of the Militia is required, is 650,000
The supposed deduction on account of the imposts by interruption in commerce, is 1,300,000
Total - 2,010,000

Balance - 3,035,451
Supposed supplies and deficiencies - 2,010,000
Leaves still a balance of - 1,025,451

That is, if the sums which I have taken from the printed report of the Committee of Ways and Means in my hand be rightly calculated by them; if there are errors, I call on the Committee again to explain them, and, in particular, to explain that lumping sum of $6,618,584.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative—yeas 28, nays 58, as follows:

SATURDAY, May 10.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Chairman of a meeting of the manufacturers of the City of Philadelphia, covering certain resolutions of the said meeting, expressive of their sense of the proposition now depending before the House, for imposing an excise on certain domestic manufactures; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 25th of March last, enclosing copies of two letters from Fulwar Skipwith, Consul of the United States at Martinique. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized and requested to direct the payment of all just expenses incurred by Fulwar Skipwith, in relieving the wants and facilitating the return of the seamen belonging to the vessels of the said States, lately taken and condemned in the British West India Islands, under orders from the British King; and that the said payment be made out of the fund provided for the intercourse with foreign nations.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. LEE, Mr. KITTERA, and Mr. PAGE, do prepare and bring in the same.

PUBLIC CREDIT.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported on Wednesday last, from the Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. Whereupon, the first resolution being still under consideration, a motion was made and seconded, further to amend the same, by inserting, in the last clause, imposing a duty on the tonnage of foreign ships or vessels, the words "British excepted; and on British ships or vessels, fifty cents per ton."

And on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS.—Thomas Blount, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, William J. Dawson, William Findley, William B. Giles, Alexander Gillon, Christopher Greenup, Carter B. And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said first resolution as amended, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The second resolution, as amended, was again read, and on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The third resolution being under consideration, a motion was made and seconded, to amend the same, by striking out the sixth clause in the words following, to wit: "Deeds, except those otherwise particularly rated, twenty-five cents."

And on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS.—Theodorius Bailey, Thomas Blount, Thomas Claiborne, Isaac Coles, George Dent, William Findley, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, Carter B. And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said third resolution as amended, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth resolutions were again read, and on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

A motion was then made and seconded, to amend the said report by adding to the end thereof the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That, after the — day of —, there be allowed on exportation, a drawback of — per pound on all tobacco; — per pound on all snuff; and — per pound on all sugars manufactured in the United States; and that no drawback shall, from the said day of —, be allowed on the exportation of any tobacco, snuff, or loaf sugar, imported into the United States."

And on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. GROVE, Mr. ORR, Mr. MADISON, Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. CHRISTIE, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. BOUNDINOT, Mr. WATTS, Mr. TRACY, Mr. ISRAEL SMITH, Mr. AMES, Mr. GILMAN, and Mr. LATIMER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. LEE, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill providing for the payment of certain expenses incurred by Fulwar Skipwith, on public account: which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Reuben Smith, for himself and Nathan Strong, made a report; which was read. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Collector for the District of New York be authorized to remit to Reuben Smith and Nathan Strong, owners of the ship James, of New York, the duties and imposts of tonnage, which may be incurred in consequence of the incompetent or invalid register of the said ship: Provided, That they shall obtain, within one hundred and twenty days, a new register for the said ship, in the manner prescribed by law.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, Mr. GILBERT, and Mr. FOSTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, May 12.

An engrossed bill, providing for the payment of certain expenses incurred by Fulwar Skipwith, on public account, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Reuben Smith and Nathan Strong; which was read twice, and committed.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the cession made by the State of New York, of a piece of land at Montauk Point, upon the east end of Long Island, for the site of a light-house, is, and shall be deemed a good and sufficient cession of the jurisdiction thereof to the United States for the purpose for which it was designed; and that it be, and is hereby, accepted as such, anything in any law to the contrary thereof, in anywise notwithstanding."

Ordered, That said motion, together with the copy of an exemplification of an act of the Legislature of New York, ceding to the United States the jurisdiction of certain lands on Montauk Point, communicated by a written Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 27th of February, 1793, be committed to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. TREDWELL.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

As the Letter which I forwarded to Congress on the 15th day of April last, from the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, to the Secretary of State, in answer to a memorial of our Minister in London, related to a very interesting subject, I thought it proper not to delay its communication. But, since that time, the memorial itself has been received, in a Letter from our Minister, and a reply has been made to that answer by the Secretary of State. Copies of them are, therefore, now transmitted.

I also send the copy of a Letter from the Governor of Rhode Island, enclosing an Act of the Legislature of that State, empowering the United States to hold lands within the same for the purpose of erecting fortifications; and certain papers concerning patents for the donation lands to the ancient settlers of Vincennes, upon the Wabash.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, May 12, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A Message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill entitled "An act in addition to the act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

STATES' ACCOUNTS.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury furnish the Executives of the several States with a copy of the book marked A, deposited in the Treasury Department by the Commissioners who settled the accounts between the individual States and the United States."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to Mr. MACOS, Mr. GILBERT, and Mr. HILLHOUSE.

Mr. MACOS then moved that a copy of a book in the Secretary of the Treasury's office, marked E, should be transmitted to each of the States.

Mr. SENECA said, that if it was proper to raise discord and jealousy in the United States, and to feed them, then the motion was right; but if it was proper to keep the States in mutual harmony, the motion was wrong. A gentleman had said that the contents of the book were so short, that he could make three copies of it in a day. Why, then, if he wanted copies, let him send his clerk to the office of the Secretary of State, and get a dozen copies made at once. There was nothing to hinder him from doing so. But why, to use the words of a great man, should the House belittle themselves by interposing in such a matter? Mr. VENABLE said, that of all which he had ever heard, this sort of arguing was the most extraordinary. The book contained an account of the settlement of the debts due between the United States. By this statement, North Carolina was largely debtor, and Massachusetts largely the creditor. Yet the members from the latter State refuse to let the former look into the matter. You, the debtors, have nothing to do with the mode of settling the account. We, the creditors, are satisfied that it is right. This appeared to be the substance of some of Mr. V.'s reasonings.

Mr. DAYTON said that, in New Jersey, they wanted no such copy. The question was referred to a select committee, who are to make a report on the propriety of transmitting official copies of the book marked E to each of the fifteen United States.

Mr. CLARK complained that members did not attend punctually at ten in the morning, which made it necessary for the House to sit till three.

THE EMBARGO.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution: "Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the present embargo be continued, and every regulation therein shall be in full force until the twentieth day of June next."

Mr. PARKER observed, that, although he was much in favor of the Embargo when it was first enacted, yet, at the present time, he thought it would be improper to continue it.

At that time, a system was formed by a majority of the House, for carrying into effect measures that might counteract the nefarious practices of the British Government in our commerce; that the first object which presented itself to him was to lay an Embargo in order that the large fleets and armies of the British in the West Indies, who were there on a design to conquer the islands of our friends, and had committed robberies on neutral property, that would disgrace a banditti of pirates; and, in order that they should be deprived of the supplies which they might require, as well as to prevent the further capture of our vessels, and treating the American flag and citizens with insult and cruelty, I thought that would be the stepping-stone to other measures which were concerted to oppose the insults of our enemies, and doing justice to our citizens, whose property had been robbed and persons abused by British armed vessels; that this was to be followed by a bill which had passed the House of Representatives by a great majority for breaking off all commerce with Great Britain after November next, and this was to be followed by an arrestation of British property, to reimburse our citizens for the losses we had sustained; that, as the se-last had produced no alteration for the better, in the conduct of her privateers. We had yet heard nothing from the agents despatched to the West Indies; and we ought not to revoke the Embargo till some change of system, on the part of Britain, should warrant the measure; we knew nothing about the actual state of matters in the West Indies. The newspapers were filled with stories of releasing American vessels in one island, and of capturing them in another. One captain had come to this port, and told a story to the editor of a newspaper. He then went to another publisher of a paper, and told a story quite opposite! The House could make nothing of such a farrago—such a jumble of contradictory reports. The public sentiment was against taking off the Embargo.

Mr. WADSWORTH was against the motion. It had been said that American ships did not arrive from the West Indies. They did arrive in great numbers, and as quickly as could be expected. From this he inferred that the ravages of British privateers had, in a great measure, ceased. Insurance at present is not higher than ten per cent. A million of bushels of salt will be wanted this season in the American States; and they will be a million of dollars dearer, if the Embargo is kept on, than if it is taken off. Mr. W. said, that he had got home all his importations for this year. He had nothing, therefore, to apprehend on his own account, from the continuance of the Embargo. It was his firm opinion, and he could declare it upon his honor to be so, that, if the Embargo continued, the value of his own imports would rise one hundred per cent. He believed that salt would rise to three dollars a bushel.

Mr. NICHOLAS had approved of the Embargo, when imposed; and he now hoped that it would be repealed by as great a majority as that which voted for laying it on.

Mr. GILES recommended a discontinuance of the Embargo. The gentleman from South Carolina had urged the public sentiment as a reason for keeping it on. He was glad to hear that the public sentiment was an argument in that House for the adoption of measures; and he was particularly highly pleased that this respect for the public sentiment had now come from the quarter from which it was at present announced. He hinted that the gentleman [Mr. W. SWARTH] had not always paid an equal deference to public sentiment. He was for the Embargo being taken off, because he understood that France would suffer considerably by its continuance; because it would materially affect the American farmers; and because, as the danger was now more fully known, merchants would beware of the danger, and provide more or less for their individual security. Farmers in the United States had entered into contracts of various kinds. For the discharge of these, they depended on the sale of their crops. He was originally for the measure, which had answered many good purposes, by preventing American vessels from falling into the hands of British privateers. He was likewise for it, as connected with a system of other measures. [Mr. G. alluded to the sequestration of British property, &c.] These measures had been laid aside; and therefore, he would now likewise be for laying this aside.

Mr. DAYTON said, that he had been in favor of laying the Embargo, both in the first month and in the second month of its continuance; but he should now be opposed to the proposition on the table, and against extending the Embargo beyond the 25th of this month, when the present one would expire. He would not be understood to found any part of his conduct upon a belief that there was a returning sense of justice in the Government of Great Britain, or that there had been any material change in the predatory system. He lamented that any of those who were on the same side should have entertained such a belief, and especially that they should have mentioned it as an argument against the motion. Where, he asked, was the proof that the instructions of the 8th of January had effected a change favorable to this country in the conduct of that nation? If there was such a change, as some gentlemen asserted, where were the two or three hundred American vessels that have been captured and carried into the British West India Islands? If we look for them in our ports, they are not to be found. It is true, that now and then a solitary vessel enters into our harbors, escaped from British depredation; but you would hear the seamen who arrived felicitating one another almost as much as if they had escaped from the clutches of pirates. He said that those instructions might make them more complacent highwaymen, but still they would be highwaymen. They might practise a little more of the solemn mockery of judicial process; they might be a little more observant of forms; but they had since continued, and would probably continue to rob us. He mentioned those things to show that there were other considerations which influenced him. These were, that an Embargo would operate hereafter most unfavorably for ourselves, particularly our farmers, and for our allies, the French. Produce, he said, would certainly fall much lower, if we continued the Embargo longer than the 25th. Our farmers and planters depend upon the sale of that produce to pay their debts, or to purchase necessities for their families; and the resolution on the table would operate doubly hard for them, not only in lowering the value of the product of their farms, but by increasing the price of every foreign article which they would need to purchase from the merchants. The injury which its further continuance would occasion to our allies, the French, had great weight with him in opposing it. It could not be denied, that France was much more dependent upon this country for supplies of provisions, in her present arduous struggle, than any other nation, or than all others; and he inferred from thence, that there could not be a disposition in that House to extend a prohibition which should add to the sufferings of those who are fighting in the cause of liberty against the most powerful combination that was ever formed to crush it.

Mr. DAYTON was likewise for taking off the Embargo. It was become pretty evident that the United States are not in immediate danger of hostilities. It was difficult to continue the Embargo till we could hear from Mr. Jay, which might require six months. Farmers suffer as much by the present restraint upon commerce as they would suffer by war.

Mr. CLARK was for letting the Embargo die of itself. He did not think it quite fair for gentlemen all to speak upon one side of a question. There was another Embargo that Mr. C. wished to see taken off as soon as it could be done with propriety. We have been embargoed in this House, said he, for six months, and if we persist in this habit of making fine speeches upon every occasion, it will be a long time before this second Embargo can be taken off.

Mr. GILSON desired that the matter might have a full discussion. He and his colleague from Charleston supported the motion by order of their constituents.

Mr. HURRY then laid on the table a letter subscribed by forty-eight of the merchants and other citizens of Charleston, who had suffered by the piracies of Britain, with a list of the ships thus taken, and an estimate of their value. The letter was read by the Clerk.

Mr. GILSON then proceeded to make a variety of remarks in support of the motion before the House. He apologised, if any part of what he had to say, should seem a digression, as the subject was of so great an extent. Mr. G. said, that he remembered, in that Assembly, in 1777, they had used to flatter themselves, that the Eastern States would build ships, and the Southern would supply them with cargoes; and they would mutually support the interest of each other. He regretted that this cordiality was not, on the present occasion, so ardent as could have been wished. As to Britain relaxing her outrages in the West Indies, the sole object of that nation is gain, no matter by what means it could be obtained. Mr. G., to show the infamy of Britain in its proper light, quoted some passages from the letter of a captain in the West Indies, who had received the most unprovoked and the most horrible treatment from these miscreants.

Mr. G. hoped that the Embargo would continue for a longer period than to the 25th of June, the term specified in the resolution. He recommended that the House should adjourn but for a short time, and continue the restriction till they sat again. It had been said, that this step would injure our allies; that the price of imports would rise, while that of exports would fall. He would be one of the last men willing to distress our allies. He hoped that the Embargo might be restricted, so as to let the French import from this country whatever they wanted in American bottoms. This would promote our commerce, if gentlemen acquainted with that business considered the measure as practicable. Referring to the remarks of Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. G. observed, that salt is at present only three shillings and six pence, or four shillings a bushel in Charleston. The price has fallen there, and it has not even risen at Philadelphia. He did not see much danger of a rise in the price of foreign articles here; merchant ships came at present frequently to this country. They encourage one another, as sure of a high market; and, as to the Embargo, they say that it cannot hold long. If the British depredations have ceased, it certainly is not owing to any change of principle in them. But our ships are kept safe at home in our harbors; their British system changes with the course of events in Europe. No nation is more insolent in prosperity; none more humiliated in adversity. Mr. G. concluded by expressing a hope that some way might be contributed for keeping on an Embargo, without injury to the farmers. If this could not be done, it must be taken off.

Mr. MURRAY hoped that the resolution would not succeed. Indeed he thought, that a total refusal of its terms would consist of our true policy. He said, he was among those who supported the first unsuccessful vote for an Embargo, and had in each following vote been for it. There were two reasons that had led him to think the Embargo a good measure, when it was laid, and continued: the risk the American trade and seamen were exposed to from that infamous course of depredation which followed the Orders of the 6th of November, and the evidence that flowed from that Order of an intention to involve this country in war. The depredations on our trade had been immense; and the Embargo was not only defensible as a good cautionary measure, to secure the seamen and vessels of this country from violence, but by shutting out our vessels from the opportunity of being longer exposed to British depredation, the occasions would be diminished that would bring up the irksome question, how far Government is bound to indemnify citizens for losses sustained under a violation of the laws of nations? The same act under which the depredations had been committed, manifested a spirit of hostility that betrayed the probability of war. He had believed, when he voted for the Embargo, that there was something of system in the November 6th Order. He thought that Order was the first movement of a system of hostile operations, which some intermediate events had set aside: of this, the Order of the 8th January, and the subsequent dismissal of the captured vessels, was evidenced. If the depredations have ceased, and the vessels captured have been released, and if the probability of war be diminished, the leading motives that justified so strong a measure had ceased to operate. There can be no doubt that vessels that have been taken have been released: the daily arrivals in various parts of the Union prove this. Had the chance of war continued in full force, the continuance of the Embargo, as is designed by this resolution, though it stood on a prodigious sacrifice of present interest, would have been not only defensible, but perhaps essential. It would not only prove negatively a benefit in the preservation of our shipping and seamen, but would operate, in the most sensible manner, as a withdrawal of supplies from the Power with whom hostilities might be expected. This great sacrifice to policy he could not now believe to be necessary longer than the term assigned by law—the 25th of this month.

The reason why he had voted for the continuance of the Embargo, though we had received intelligence of the revocation of the obnoxious and shameful Order of 6th November, was, because he had lost all confidence in the justice or wisdom of those who issued it; as he thought the first unjust by premeditation, he had suspected the last as insidious: however, this we know, that they have released our vessels. So very extensive was the influence of embargoes in this country, that nothing but dire necessity could justify them; a country with small capital and yet of immense export, and the great part of that export of a quality that could not endure the Summer's heat. In such a moment as the present, where evidence of the opinions of the public was so contradictory, he would endeavor to do what appeared to be the broad and general interest. There was, he believed, a field open to speculation by the doubt entertained of this day's decision: a variety of opposite interests of course were thus created, and opinions and wishes might be expected out of doors from the different views of self-interest. Those who had to purchase grain, for instance, calculating on the almost certain termination of the Embargo some time this Summer, and foreseeing great prices in foreign markets, might, if they were actuated by selfish principles, wish to see this resolution succeed. As the aspect of affairs had certainly considerably altered, and the reasons that led to the Embargo had so diminished as no longer to warrant either a dread of the capture of our vessels or the apprehension of war, (at least speedily,) he hoped the resolution would fail of success.

Mr. BOURDINOT asked what assurance we have, that Britain will not play the same game over again that she has done already? Does not that new Order prohibit, as much as ever, American vessels from carrying provisions to her West India Islands? As to the Republic of France, he could make great allowances for their situation, but, after all, what apology could there be made for the starving of American sailors in French harbors? Is this proper? These men, as Mr. B. had been well informed, were at this moment actually starving, and in want of the common necessities of life. If the Embargo is taken off, this must be done upon the principle that it ought never to have been laid on. We must expect, that if our ships go back again to the West Indies, they will be taken as formerly. He could wish to stand by the measure, since it had once been adopted, and let the West Indies see that we can starve them out; let them see that we can make them feel the effects of our measures. He did not wish to continue the Embargo one moment longer than public necessity requires; but to have made the merchants and farmers suffer as they have done in nothing, was rather vexatious.

Mr. W. SMITH defended his resolution. It had been alleged that emigrants wanting to get back to the West Indies, were prevented by this Embargo. Government had provided for that. The point, it is said, has been determined, that the West Indies depend on America for subsistence. He asserted, on the contrary, that this point was not determined; and this revocation will prove to the world, that we are as eager to sell, as they are to buy. He hoped that there was a spirit in this country to stand the consequences of the measures. He next replied to the ironical applause bestowed upon him in a former part of this debate, by Mr. GILES, for his recently assumed respect to the public sentiment. He said that it is often very difficult to say what public sentiment is. The member himself had often opposed the public sentiment: he had opposed the arming of frigates, and yet that was surely a popular measure. At the same time, he hoped that no member would vote for a measure that his judgment condemns, because it is said to be a popular one; as this would reduce him to a mere puppet—a machine. It had been said, that this Embargo should be taken off on account of France; but our vessels, if that obstacle is removed, will not go to France: they will go to the West Indies, where they can get thirty dollars a barrel for their flour, which they cannot get in France.

Mr. S. next adverted to the other Embargo, upon the members of the House, referred to by Mr. CLARK. He hoped that public business would not be treated with levity, and that they would rise, when they found it convenient; but if the gentleman was so very impatient to get home, he could be very well spared by the House.

Mr. CLARK rose, and said a few words in reply.

Mr. GILES approved of the idea of Mr. GILSON, as to the limiting the Embargo to the sailing of vessels for the West Indies: and a resolution to this effect was laid by the member on the table. Mr. G. thought this a proper discrimination, and if it could be effected, the true ground that the House ought to take. As to what the farmers of America had suffered by the Embargo, Mr. G. believed that there was not a single planter in the district which he represented, who would not rather burn his wheat, and dance round the bonfire, than sell it to the West Indies to feed the British army. He would have brought forward a motion of this nature sooner, but he had not thought that it would succeed, nor did he think yet that it would. It would however show his sentiments, and he hoped the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. W. SMITH,] if he was anxious to support his reputation for consistency, would give his vote for the resolution.

The question being put, to amend the resolution, by inserting after the word "continued," the words "upon all vessels bound to the West Indies, Bermuda, or Nova Scotia;" it passed in the negative—yeas 34, nays 52, as follows:

TUESDAY, May 13.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Reuben Smith and Nathan Strong, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act in addition to the Act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," was read twice, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. WALKER, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for determining the Northern boundary of the Territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; which was read twice, and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act further to authorize the adjournment of Circuit Courts," to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. GORNOX, from the committee appointed, presented a bill granting relief to James Bell; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States, upon the final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States.

Ordered. That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, May 14.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act further to authorize the adjournment of Circuit Courts," was read three times, and passed.

Mr. AXES, from the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of George Blanchard, in behalf of Edward Blanchard, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

On a motion made and seconded, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be delivered to the Senators and Representatives of the State of South Carolina all the vouchers which were, by the agent of the said State, lodged with the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and the several States, and since deposited in the Treasury, and which have been required by the Legislature of South Carolina."

Ordered. That the said motion be committed to Mr. CLARK, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. HUNTER.

Mr. LYMAS, from the committee appointed to select such parts of the confidential communications received from the President of the UNITED STATES on the twenty-fourth of February last, as are proper to be made public, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

BALANCES DUE CERTAIN STATES.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments, reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States, upon the final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, which lay on the table; and the said amendments being twice read at the Clerk's

A motion was made and seconded further to amend the said bill, by adding to the end thereof the following section, to wit:

"And be it further enacted, That the balances reported by the said Commissioners, and carried to the debit of certain States, be, and the same are hereby, relinquished."

And on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 23, nays 58, as follows:

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act for erecting a light-house on the Island of Seaguin, in the District of Maine," with several amendments, to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act providing for the payment of certain public expenses incurred by Fulwar Skipwith on his desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed to the said bills; and, the same being severally read, were agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the amendatory report of the committee to whom was recommended the report on the memorial of Arthur St. Clair; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to several resolutions thereupon; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That there be allowed to Arthur St. Clair, at the rate of — dollars per day, for the time he was employed in going from New York, to Pittsburgh, and till his return to New York, between November, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, and February, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight.

Resolved, That he be allowed at the rate of — dollars per day for the time he was employed in holding a treaty with the Indians, commenced in June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight; and that the time be computed from his commencing that business till the treaties were delivered to the President of the UNITED STATES.

Resolved, That there be allowed, in the settlement of his account, two hundred dollars for a negro killed in the public service; also, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, advanced to Major Hamtramck; and that interest be allowed on his account.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolutions, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. HINDMAN, do prepare and bring in the same.

THURSDAY, May 15.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Lewis Dubois; whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to authorize the Comptroller of the Treasury to settle the accounts of Lewis Dubois, for his services in the line of the Army of the United States, similar to others of his rank, who were deranged in the service.

Ordered, That Mr. TALBOT, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. GROVE, be a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed on the part of this House, to be joined by such committee as the Senate shall appoint, to consider and report what further business is necessary to be done during the present session; and at what time it will be proper to adjourn the same.

Ordered, That Mr. LYMAN, Mr. CLARK, and Mr. VENABLE, be appointed the committee on the part of the House.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee to whom was referred the motion of the 14th instant, for the delivery of certain documents deposited with the late Board of Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States to the Senators and Representatives of the State of South Carolina, made a report: which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia Line, on Continental Establishment, to obtain titles to certain lands lying North-west of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Scioto;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and were discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and it was recommended to Mr. HEATH, Mr. NEVILLE, and Mr. ORR.

Mr. MAON, from the committee to whom was referred the motion of the twelfth instant, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Executives of the several States with a copy of the book marked A, deposited in the Treasury Department, by the Commissioners for settling the accounts between the United States and the individual States; made a report, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to compensate Arthur St. Clair, which was twice read and committed.

INDEMNITY FOR SPOILIATIONS.

Mr. GOODHUE moved the following resolution:

"Whereas it is a primary object in the establishment of Civil Government, to protect the persons and property of its citizens, from the violence of nations as well as individuals; and whereas many of the citizens of the United States have suffered great losses, by spoliation made on their commerce, under the authority of Great Britain, in violation of the law of nations, and the rights of neutrality,

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States will guarantee an indemnification to all such citizens of the United States, whose property may have been captured and confiscated, under the authority of Great Britain, in violation of the Law of Nations, and the rights of neutrality."

Mr. GOODHUE moved that the resolution might be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, which was seconded by Mr. DEXTER. It was then moved, by way of amendment to the motion, by Mr. DAYTON, to add these words, "to whom was referred the resolution for the sequestration of British debts;" to which Mr. GOODHUE objected, because, he said the subjects were distinct and separate in their nature, and ought not to be combined. His resolution went only to establish the principle of indemnification, by guaranteeing it to the sufferers, leaving the fund from which it should be made (in case Great Britain should refuse to do us justice,) to a future consideration. That whether British debts were sequestered or not, he said, the United States were bound to see that indemnity was made to the merchants whose property had been kidnapped in a secret, clandestine manner, while pursuing a lawful trade, under the authority of this Government and the Law of Nations, or to give them an opportunity of indemnifying themselves, by making reprisals. That it was well known there was great opposition to the sequestration of British debts; and it was very doubtful whether such a measure would ever be adopted; and if this resolution was to be referred to the same committee, and become connected with that, he should very much despair of ever getting any indemnification. That British debts were a very precarious and uncertain fund; and the idea of ever getting indemnification from that source, would operate as a delusion. That if sequestration, under any circumstances, could be proper, it was highly improper at this time, when an Envoy Extraordinary had just been despatched to Great Britain; and more so, as we had discontinued the Embargo, which would put all our remaining vessels in the power of that nation. He should, therefore, consider an agreement to the amendment as amounting to a determination not to consider the subject, at least for the present session.

In support of the amendment, it was argued, that the two subjects had an intimate connexion with each other, and never ought to be separated: that British debts and British property were the natural and only funds for paying British depredations, and if indemnity was not given this way, it ought not to be given at all; that, as it was probable the resolution for sequestration would lay dormant for some time, it was best to refer this to the same committee, that they might sleep together. The amendment was supported by Messrs. LYMAN, NICHOLAS, SMILIE, DEARBORN, and MADISON.

Mr. DAYTON made a number of pointed remarks, on what he considered as the total futility of such a resolution. He looked on it as nothing better than an awkward attempt to gain popularity. He complained bitterly of the injustice of bringing up this motion alone; because when he voted against it, it might be surmised that he was unfavorable to the redress of the injuries of a certain class of citizens. He was for redressing their wrongs, and he had marked out to the House the only effectual way in which those wrongs should ever be redressed, viz.: the sequestration of British property. He adverted to an expression made use of, some days ago, by Mr. SEDGWICK, who had called this a mad project. Mr. D. was of opinion that the mad-cup might with propriety be transferred to a different situation, which he specified to the House. He said, that we were frequently told of the justice due to the British subjects. Be it so. But was there not justice also due to the people of the United States? And what justice could there be in attempting to make the American citizens pay for depredations committed by British privateers, when we had in our hands British property? Were we not bound to take as much care of our own interest, as of that of other people? It had been said, that as a negotiation was to commence under an Ambassador Extraordinary, that this measure would impede its success. He was, on the contrary, convinced, that this was the only step that could be likely to insure the success of Mr. Jay's mission. It would teach Britain to give up her infamous conduct. It would convert, in the literal sense of the word, every English manufacturing House, that had debts due to it in this country, into an American negotiator; and they would, for their own sakes, compel their Government to do justice to the American merchants.

Mr. D. scouted the idea of taxing America, to pay for the depredations committed in the West Indies. Supposing, what every gentleman in the House knew to be impossible, that if Congress actually were to pass such an act, the people would not submit to pay their money for any such purpose.

Mr. SEDGWICK said, it certainly had not been his wish that this question should be brought forward at the present time. As it was, however, before the House, as he approved the motives of his colleague, who made the motion, and as he perfectly concurred with him in opinion on the subject, he would make a few concise observations. He believed, that in a Government such as that of this country, it was the peculiar duty of those to whom the administration has been committed, to extend security and protection to all the interests, and redress for all the injuries of the citizens. That inexcusable and unexampled injuries had been perpetrated, and an immense value in property unjustly spoiled, and that the honor of our country had been insulted, without provocation, were facts admitted by all. Those whose property had been the sport of wanton violation, which, in many instances, had reduced the sufferers from ease and affluence to want and misery, came forward and demanded redress and indemnification. That they were entitled to such indemnification, from the nature of our social compact, he understood to be agreed by every gentleman.

[Here Mr. S. was interrupted by several members; and Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. SMITH declared that, in their opinion, there was no obligation to indemnify the sufferers, except it were done out of a fund to be formed by the sequestration of British property.]

Mr. S. said he was obliged to the gentlemen for setting him right; till now he had believed that the right of the sufferers to indemnification was denied by none. If this, however, was really a question yet to be decided, it was due to the sufferers, it was due to our own honor, to decide it without delay. It was asked, by what means is the Government to administer redress? They were first to apply to the Governments which had inflicted the injuries, to state their nature and extent, and to demand, in unequivocal terms, redress. This business, notwithstanding all the opposition which had been made, was happily in a proper train. He hoped and believed that the application would be effectual. It might, however, fail; and in that case, he was free to declare, that we owed it to our honor and to our injured citizens, to attempt redress by means of the last resort. In that unhappy event, the interests of the sufferers must be involved with the general interests of the nation, and must abide the ultimate result of war. But if satisfaction should not be obtained by negotiation, and should the Government, from any political considerations, not seek redress by force, in such events the sufferers would have a just claim on their country for indemnification.

The question now immediately before the House was, to refer the motion for indemnification to the Committee of the Whole on the subject of sequestration. This was not fair, as it respected that part of the House who approved an engagement to indemnify, and who would never consent to sequestration. It was not fair as respected the sufferers, because he believed there was not a gentleman in the House who supposed that the measure of sequestration would prevail. He was astonished that any should believe that it ought to be adopted. He, himself, without hesitation, approved of engaging to indemnify the sufferers; but at the same time, with all his heart, he abhorred sequestration and confiscation of debts, as the measures which all civilized nations had for more than a century abandoned as immoral and unjust. He would not now enter into a discussion of the question of sequestration. Whenever it came directly under consideration, he pledged himself to undertake to prove that it was against the Law of Nations, that it was immoral, unjust, and impolitic. He had been sorry to perceive that the feelings of the mover of that proposition [Mr. DAYTON] were wounded, by the terms in which gentlemen had spoken of his motion. He himself, in his conscience, believed it to be immoral and unjust; and, as such, he felt himself bound as a man of honor to give it his strenuous opposition. The gentleman surely could not reasonably expect that independent men would sacrifice opinion to politeness or to friendship. All he could do, and that he did with pleasure, was to declare that he believed the gentleman's motives were pure and upright, and that he had a perfect confidence in the correctness of his moral sentiments. Viewing the subject in the light he had expressed he appealed to the candor and fairness of gentlemen, to what tended the combining of those irritating questions of indemnification and sequestration, but to wound the feelings and evade the just application of the sufferers? Gentlemen had charged his colleague, and those who had supported his motion, with attempting, by these means, meanly to court popularity. To refute this charge would, in his opinion, be unnecessary, because no well-informed man in America would believe it. He did not know that the opinions which were held by his friends and himself on this subject, were popular; it was sufficient that they were believed to be just. Was he, however, disposed to recriminate, by disclosing motives which were not avowed, but concealed, he could tell a tale, which, he believed, could be heard with effect.

Mr. GOODHUE spoke a few words in direct opposition to what had been advanced by Mr. DAYTON. The two propositions ought to be discussed separately. We had sent a negotiator to Britain, and a sequestration would put an end to his business. The citizens of the United States ought to be taxed, in the meantime, to pay these losses; and it was possible that a sequestration might, hereafter, be thought advisable. He very strongly pressed the idea of a tax to this end. It would be a proceeding of the most superlative impropriety, to lay on such a sequestration at this particular juncture, when we had just agreed to take off the Embargo, because our ships would go to England, and be all seized, by way of reprisal.

Mr. CLARK recommended that both propositions should be laid aside for the present, and be suffered to take a sweet nap together, till a more convenient time. He spoke with much contempt of the notion of taxing the people of this country to pay for the ravages of Britain. The Court of London would say to the world: "You see that we acted right: you see the United States think so likewise; for they themselves pay their merchants."

Mr. GILES agreed with Mr. CLARK; but as there is a necessary sameness in the arguments on this question, and as they have already been detailed in so many different forms, it seems needless to repeat them over again so frequently. He said that when this tax came to be levied, every farmer would say, every man in America would say, "We shall have nothing to do with this business. Why don't you indemnify British depredations out of the British property that is within your grasp?" He had heard that Congress ought to decide an abstract proposition, viz: that this Government was, in any event, bound to pay the recent losses of its merchants by sea; and then proceed to assign funds for the payment. He thought that before Congress undertook any such engagement, they ought at least to be possessed of the money requisite to discharge it. He hoped that the House would never proceed to a vote in support of any abstract axiom, especially where taxes and public money were concerned, till they had carefully digested the collateral circumstances.

Mr. DEXTER spoke against the amendment. He said, that very strong reasons existed both for taking into consideration a proposition for indemnity to the sufferers, and also against connecting it with sequestration or any other subject. Each ought to stand or fall on its own merits. The sufferers were numerous, and deserving citizens; they had waited a long time, and had a right to know, before the close of the session, what protection they were to expect from the Government of their own country. Sequestration, without a change of political circumstances, would never pass both Houses of the Legislature; to connect them, then, would be to deny relief, without even examining the principles on which they claim it. He said, British debts had been called the only proper and natural funds: in his opinion, they would be no fund at all, even if sequestration could be adopted.

The debts would never be collected; and not only so, but sequestration would be the beginning of hostilities, and war must ensue; this, at the same moment, would prevent all hope of obtaining justice from Britain, and also discharge our own Government from every obligation to indemnify. Mr. D. said he would state what, in his opinion, was the proper and natural fund—the money to be demanded of Britain by our Envoy Extraordinary. Should this fail, the Government of America would either pay the sufferers, or grant them letters of marque and reprisal. This, he said, is the constant course of nations, and this the sufferers have a right to demand, as a counterpart of their allegiance. Mr. D. said, it had been objected that the British Government would be encouraged by it to refuse a recompense. This, if true, would be a serious objection, for he had always viewed negotiation as affording the only probable chance for indemnity to the sufferers. If a recompense be refused by Britain, war will be the consequence. The objection, however, he thought, would be entirely removed, by attending to the resolution itself. It is not, he said, a provision for taking the debt on ourselves, but merely to guarantee a recompense to the sufferers. The very word itself implies that the Government of America is not the principal debtor, but is to compel another to make indemnity, or become the debtor. Mr. D. closed with saying that he had attended only to the reasoning of the gentlemen, and not to their personalities. It was not his practice to leave the question to impute to others motives either corrupt or paltry: if they chose to glean imaginary laurels on this ground, he was not anxious to share them; they could best judge whether, in this way, they were likely to increase their reputation or benefit the public.

Messrs. AMES, MURRAY, SMITH, of South Carolina, and HULLHOUSE, also spoke against the amendment, and said the merits of neither proposition were now before the House, but only the mode in which the subject should be considered; that they were in themselves separate and independent, and ought to have a separate and independent consideration; they were questions of very great national concern, and that blending them together would give an undue bias, and neither would be fairly and impartially decided. It was doubtful whether the resolution for sequestration ever ought to be adopted, and that to connect the two subjects, would be to hang a mill-stone about the necks of the sufferers; that, as they were a numerous and very meritorious class of citizens, their claim merited a candid and full examination, unembarrassed with any other matter.

A warm dispute arose about the form in which the question on this resolution should be taken. The point actually contested seemed to be, whether the resolution was to be referred to the Committee on Mr. DAYTON's motion for the sequestration of British property, or to a separate committee, which was insisted on by the mover, Mr. GOODHUE.

A division took place upon the question of agreeing to Mr. DAYTON's amendment, to add, after the words "be referred to a Committee of the Whole," the following words, viz: "to whom were referred the resolutions for sequestering the British debts;" and the yeas and nays being called for, were taken—yeas 57, nays 31, as follows:

FEDAY, May 16.

A memorial of sundry merchants, and other inhabitants, of Boston, Charlestown, Salem, Marblehead, Beverly, Newburyport, Manchester, Gloucester, Ipswich, and Danvers, in the State of Massachusetts, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that the most speedy and effectual measures may be adopted by Congress to obtain restitution for the depredations committed on their property, which, under color of decrees of Admiralty Courts, has been condemned, and adjudged forfeited, by the subjects of the King of Great Britain, and the citizens and subjects of other foreign countries. Also, a memorial of sundry merchants of the city of New York, whose names are thereunto subscribed, to the same effect.

Ordered, that the said memorial be referred to the Committee of the Whole House to whom are committed certain propositions for the acquiescence of the debts due from citizens of the United States, to the subjects of the King of Great Britain.

A petition of Gurdon Backus and David Meade Randolph, was presented to the House and read, praying relief against a judgment obtained in the District Court of the United States, for the State of Virginia, for the recovery of a bond, given by the petitioners, for the return of the certificate of registry of the sloop Rambler, late belonging to the petitioner Backus, which sloop was sold on the coast of Africa, to a foreigner; and the said certificate, with a trunk and other papers stolen from him, by one of his seamen, and never recovered.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. SWIFT, Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, and Mr. GILES; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

An engrossed bill making provision for the payment of the interest on the balances due to certain States, upon the final settlement of the accounts between the United States and the individual States, was read the third time.

And on the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 53, nays 34—as follows:

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House for the appointment of a joint committee to consider and report what further business is necessary to be done, during the present session, and at what time it will be proper to adjourn the same; and have appointed a committee on their part.

CHEROKEE INDIANS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the thirtieth of January last, transmitting the copy of a Letter from Constant Freeman, agent for the War Department, in Georgia, relative to the Creek Indians; and on the report of the committee to whom was referred a memorial of the Representatives of the people of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio.

The Chairman, Mr. PARKER, read to the House one of these papers, viz: a memorial from the House of Representatives of the Territory South-west of the Ohio. They stated the hardships that the people of that country had suffered from the Cherokee. The murder of two hundred people of all descriptions, and the loss of two thousand horses, worth on an average, fifty dollars each, formed a part of the catalogue of their misfortunes. They expressed their satisfaction in hearing that the Congress had taken measures for protecting American commerce from the ravages of the Al-gerines, and hoped that while their countrymen in the Atlantic cities lived in safety and in luxury, this distant portion of the Federal Government would not be forgotten, or neglected. They solicited the adoption of a more effectual system of defence.

A report was read from the committee, who had been appointed to take this memorial into consideration.

Mr. MASON objected to some part of the report. It had been stated by the committee, that the Governor of that country should be authorized in case of any irruption by the Indians, to attack them with an armed force, and compel them to an observance of the treaties made with the United States. Mr. M. considered this language as irregular, because by the laws, and universal sense of nations, when hostilities are once commenced between two different States, existing treaties are at an end; and, therefore, an armed force cannot compel the observance of old treaties, but the formation of new ones. He stated several objections to the method pointed out in the report of the select committee for giving military aid to the back settlers.

This discussion called up Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DAYTON, and several other members. At last the committee agreed to several amendments. They rose, and the Chairman reported. The House then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole House, on this subject.

The resolutions were read and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized to call out such number of the militia of the Government of the Territory South of the River Ohio, or of the States most conveniently situated, as may be requisite to carry on offensive operations against any nation or tribe of Indians, that may continue hostile.

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT be authorized to cause to be established and guarded, such military posts as, in his judgment, will be necessary for the permanent security of the frontier settlers, and to employ one or more troops of horse, as patrols or rangers between the said posts.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. CARNES, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. MEBANE, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. PATSTON, do prepare and bring in the same.

REVENUE BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels.

The three cents per bushel of additional duty on salt was objected to by Mr. FINDLEY, as oppressive to his constituents.

Mr. AINS was convinced, that this was much better than a land-tax. It was beyond all comparison, more cheap, more certain, and more equal in the collection than a land-tax. He would rather tax salt, at even half a dollar per bushel, than agree to a land-tax.

Mr. CLARK would be very glad to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FINDLEY] specify upon what subject he was willing to pay a tax. It was beyond the comprehension of Mr. C., for what sort of a tax the gentleman was prepared to vote, or, indeed, what sort of taxes the Western settlers of Pennsylvania pay. We lay a duty on sugar. They make sugar for themselves. We lay a tax on tobacco. They are to manufacture for themselves. We lay an excise on distilleries. They refuse to pay this tax, and, in fact, they do not pay it. We tax wines; but we are told that these people are poor. They cannot, therefore, afford to drink wine, on which the duty is very heavy, for that duty is paid only by the rich. We tax the importation of foreign fineries, such as silk, but silk also is not the dress of poor people, so that here again the constituents of the gentleman get off. We are going to tax the importation of foreign coals, but they have plenty of their own, and so far from paying a tax on them, are cutting a canal to bring them down to Philadelphia; which will drive out the importation of foreign coals, and so destroy the tax altogether. Under these circumstances, Mr. C. was solicitous to learn what taxes the back settlers paid, for, as far as he could understand, they paid none; and their Representative would do well to inform the House on what they were willing to pay a tax. Was Government to be burdened with them, and derive no compensation? Was it a sufficient reason for exempting a district from public burdens to say that the people are poor? Are taxes to be paid exclusively by the rich?

Mr. RUTHERFORD objected to this duty on salt. It was often to be carried from one to three hundred and fifty miles inland, and in fact, it frequently costs twenty shillings per bushel. No tax could be so universally unpopular as this would be.

Mr. FINDLEY replied to Mr. CLARK. As to sugar, though some of his neighbors made theirs, Mr. F. bought his own in Philadelphia. As to silks and other female fineries, his constituents did just like other people. They spent, in that way, as much as they could possibly afford, and had among them ladies very well dressed. As to other matters, his constituents purchased their manufactures in Philadelphia, and paid for them, as other people did. Salt, he said, was known to be necessary for cattle in the back country. He was strongly against the tax.

Mr. GILLON likewise opposed the tax on salt. It had been proposed in the State which he represented, but never could be carried through.

On a division, it was rejected; yeas 32, noes 47.

A motion was made for striking out twenty-five cents per ton of additional tonnage, on foreign vessels, in order to insert fifty.

It was passed in the negative; yeas 39, noes 41.

After going through the bill, the Committee rose, and the House went into consideration of the amendments made in Committee of the Whole.

On the subject of an additional duty on coal transported, Mr. GILES said, that the rise was very moderate from four and an half to six cents per ton. A Boston company was about, as he understood, to embark in this business, but waited to see the steps taken by Congress. There was as much coal in Virginia as would serve all America, and Europe besides.

Mr. WADSWORTH would have the additional duty restricted to all coal imported in foreign vessels.

Mr. HEISTER wanted to know whether the price of coal had not been already doubled within these few years. He was informed that coal imported had of late risen from six dollars per ton, to twelve dollars and a half.

Mr. FITZSIMONS said, that a few years would put an end to importation altogether. He defended the tax. He saw no danger to any of the manufactures in America, that make use of foreign coal arising from this tax. Nothing but a capital was wanting to make America supply herself.

Mr. SHERBURNE recommended the amendment of Mr. WADSWORTH, as to the restriction of this duty to foreign bottoms.

Mr. MANISON worded this amendment "on all vessels not belonging to citizens of the United States;" because foreign bottoms might belong to people of this country. He was not solicitous about the fate of the motion. The amendment was lost; but the original motion was carried.

Another amendment was, "after the fourth section to add six cents additional per ton on American tonnage."

Mr. GOODRICH considered that nothing could be so sore upon our merchants, as this burden at this time, when half our shipping are in the hands of the Algerines or the British.

It passed in the negative—yeas 39, nays 45—as follows:

others in the country, not excepting the gentleman himself; and men who are as well liked by their neighbors.

Mr. W. SMITH. The rejection of the bill at this time will not decide the principle of excise; if rejected, it will not be owing to the arguments against it, but to the absence of a great many members, who never dreamed that the question would have been brought on to-day, and who do not even know that the bill has been so much as reported. The practice is uncanon, and unprecedented, to endeavor to reject a bill at this stage, before it has been printed, and the members know its contents. Was it fair and consistent, in a thin House, to reject the bill without any further consideration than one reading, for the sake of form, a reading to which nobody had listened? How was this to settle the principle of excise? Was it not already settled in the Constitution and by existing laws? But a new argument had been this day resorted to; there was a surplus of revenue in the Treasury, without new taxes, and this had been discovered, since this tax had been agreed to. If this argument was founded in fact, it would put an end to all debates on all the new taxes; but what was this notable discovery? an additional two-and-a-half per cent. on impost. This was no discovery which could change the question, for it was agreed to, before the duty on manufactured tobacco and sugar; and the latter had been there fore established by the House, with a knowledge that the former was laid. He asked, if, in the present situation of the country, all dependence was to be placed on commerce? How could certain members reconcile this proceeding with their former votes and language? But the other day we were to prohibit all commercial intercourse, to sequester debts, and to prepare for war. Now, we are to derive the whole of the revenues from trade; the same gentlemen who urged these measures were now defeating every kind of revenue, which might be productive. There was something so extraordinary in this, that he could not account for it. It was said, that the Committee of Ways and Means ought not to have reckoned on a default, in the impost of $1,300,000, but the gentlemen assign no reasons for their assertion, where as the committee founded their report on the best information. Admit, however, that it is doubtful; was it safe, in the present critical state of the country, to place all dependence on external resources, which were every moment in danger of being cut off? Did not duty require a provision for the defence and safety of the United States, by internal resources? This was certain, that the extra appropriations of this year exceeded those of any former year by two millions and a half of dollars. Where was the money to come from? The members in opposition to this tax, voted out land and salt; they endeavored to vote out stamps and carriages. They will agree to nothing but impost. Are the merchants to be saddled with the whole burden, because, like friends to order and tranquility, they have not called town meetings, or published inflammatory resolves? It is said, war is no longer expected; this country is willing to submit to every thing. Was this insinuation pointed at Congress or the Executive? It was unfounded in either case; because negotiation was tried, it did not follow that either the one or the other branch of the Government were disposed tamely to submit to injury; for himself, he was ready to aver that, if proper reparation were not obtained, he should be for war. The balance now being trembling on its beam; and no one could say whether it would settle for peace or war, he was for preparing seriously for the latter, while we strove to preserve the former. Pecuniary exertions were indispensable; it might be a pleasant thing to oppose taxes, and the advocates of new taxes might be obnoxious, but this would not draw him from his duty. The increase of excise officers had been mentioned; the bill did not propose a single one; the bad character of the excise officers had been mentioned; the supervisors were among the most respectable men in the United States, and the inspectors were as virtuous as the officers of oaths, &c., were not more applicable to manufacturers than to merchants and captains, who could not enter, or unlade, or clear out, without difficulties, embarrassments, and oaths; but this was disregarded, as if they had less feeling than other people. As to the injury to morals, the necessary oaths required by all revenue laws were not injurious to the morals of the honest, and those who swore to the truth; and, as to those who were disposed to commit frauds and perjuries, no injury could be done to the morals of these who had none. Mr. S. wished that less had been said in the way of general reflection on the Collectors of the revenue. Some years ago, a member of that House, when they were at New York, attacked the tide-waiters. There happened to be a tide-waiter in the gallery, who wrote, next day, a pretty smart letter to the member, who had spoken so freely of his profession.

Mr. NILES hoped that no gentleman would say, that he wished to see the Treasury empty. He would, for his own part, be glad to know whether there was a deficiency or not, clearly stated. He did not see so much as some others did, in the objections to an excise. It was called an excise, it was true, but we do not know yet the way in which it is to be levied; so, we cannot tell whether there will be any hardship in it or not. He went over some of the statements of different gentlemen, but on the whole, there was so much contradiction in the assertions of different members, that Mr. N. knew not what to make of them.

Mr. BOUNDINOR moved that the House adjourn, which they did immediately, at three o'clock.

MONDAY, May 19.

A memorial of the inhabitants of the town of Salem, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying a further continuation of the Embargo laid on ships or vessels in the ports of the United States, bound to any foreign port or place. Laid on the table.

IMPRESSMENT OF AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. MURRAY moved, that a committee be appointed to report a bill to provide such regulations as may enable American seamen to obtain and carry evidence of citizenship, for the purpose of protecting them from impressment into foreign service. He said, that it was a reasonable expectation that the subject of this resolution should be seriously attended to, at any time; but there were the most urgent reasons for its attention to the situation of our fellow-citizens of this description at the present period. That the evil of impressment into foreign service existed, no gentleman could doubt, and it was equally doubtless, that it was the duty of Congress, as far as they could, to provide a remedy for the evil. A few years since, when Britain armed her navy against Spain, on the Nootka-Sound question, it had been the fate of several hundreds of the American seamen to be impressed into a service which they abhorred. For a proof of this fact, he would read the remembrance of the House, to the claim made by Mr. Cutting for repayment of money actually expended by him, in the liberation of seamen in this humiliating situation. Congress repaid Mr. Cutting two thousand dollars. That they had thus attended to this claim was proof that the fact complained of existed. The evil arose, not more from the extreme insolence of disposition of the press-gangs, than from a real difficulty of discriminating American citizens from British subjects. The difficulty was, in similarity of language, dress, and manners; and from the deficiency of evidence of citizenship, which, in a foreign port, could not always be obtained. For, though the Lords of the Admiralty of England had laid down certain rules, in the case that he had mentioned, the rules laid down had exacted so rigid and pointed an oath, from personal knowledge, that they scarcely could, in any case, be complied with. A captain might, in many instances, believe his sailor to be an American, and yet not think himself warranted in making oath to this fact. The object of his resolution was, that seamen, who are American citizens, might all pursue a uniform line of evidence in proof of citizenship, and that, by an entry of such evidence solemnly obtained in the clearances or other authentic papers of the ship, the same weight and authority should be given to their part of a ship's papers as were, in all cases, given to all sea letters and other papers. He believed that, if the subject went to a select committee, a particular regulation on this subject might be digested, which would, in many cases, if not in all, afford such good evidence of citizenship, as would save American seamen from the injustice and cruelty that many, he believed, now actually suffered under; for he had heard that a number of them had been impressed in the West Indies on board of the British fleet. He was not so sanguine as to imagine, that any law could give full protection to our seamen; for he was convinced that, in order to give complete protection, certain rules of evidence must first be recognised, by Convention between this country and Britain, stipulating the extent of certain political principles relative to alienage and allegiance. Till, however, that is done, he thought it the duty of Congress, and particularly, at this disturbed period, to afford every aid in its power to this class of citizens. To bring the subject before the House, he had moved the resolution, which he gave notice, that he would call up to-morrow.

TOBACCO AND SUGAR DUTIES.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill for laying a duty on manufactured tobacco and refined sugar, which had been debated and postponed on Saturday.

Mr. GOODRICH wished for a delay. He had seen a gentleman from Pennsylvania, last night, whom he did not now see in his place in the House, and who was making out an estimate, whether the money proposed to be raised by these taxes would be wanted or not. If they could really do without the money, it would be better to reject the bill.

Mr. SHERBURNE thought that the question might be delayed, till it was seen, whether the sums, to be produced by this bill, would be actually required, or not.

Mr. DAYTON believed that the money was wanted. He would therefore vote for the bill. It was incumbent on gentlemen who objected to the bill, to show that the money would not be wanted.

Mr. SMULIE and Mr. LEE rose at the same time. The SPEAKER observed, that Mr. SMULIE had risen first.

Mr. LEE said, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had already spoke twice on this subject; and he intended for order. [Mr. L. referred to the proceedings of Saturday, for Mr. SMULIE had not spoke any before, this day.] Our time, said Mr. L., is too precious to be wasted in talking, when every gentleman is competent to give his vote already. I call for the question. His opinion was, that the money was not yet wanted; and that it was being too provident to vote for taxes, before they were required by necessity.

Mr. W. SMITH contended, that there would be a very considerable deficiency. He asked, who would lend us money, if there was such a difficulty in establishing funds to pay the interest of it?

Mr. WADSWORTH hoped that the bill would not be altogether thrown aside. There was part of it that he approved, and part of it that he did not perfectly approve. In discussing this question, much stress has been laid upon the two-and-a-half per cent. of additional impost on importations, as if that would be a fund for the increase of revenue, and supersede the necessity for some other taxes. Mr. W. assigned his reasons for believing that this supposition was perfectly chimerical. Within the last six months, American vessels and property had been captured by the British privateers in the West Indies, to the extent of one million of dollars. This will make the importations less, by at least five hundred thousand dollars, and, of consequence, destroy a great part both of the old and new impost. Property to the extent of one-fourth of a million of dollars, perhaps, had likewise been seized by the Spaniards, and other nations had most likely taken as much more. The total loss to American commerce could not, therefore, be less than fifteen hundred thousand dollars. The imposts on importations must, therefore, be very much reduced; as from Britain, for example, there would not, in his judgment, be one-fourth part of the imports, from this time to the first of December, that had been formerly. And no man could imagine that, at the most, they would exceed one-half of their former amount. The British merchants would be afraid, on account of the matters that had been laying embargoes, and speaking of sequestration and indemnification. We must be cautious. Mr. W. added, that it was possible enough, that America might, in the Fall, be at war with Britain; and then impost and importation will fall together. These were his motives for believing that the two-and-a-half per cent. would be of no great consequence. It had been said, that the ten per cent. would produce a large augmentation. He did not, from the diminished quantity of imports, believe that it would be so much, by twenty or thirty per cent, as the old revenue-and-a-half duty had produced. Mr. W. next reverted to the bill before the House. One part of it (the duty on snuff) he could not agree to. The other part, refined sugars, would fall on those who could afford to pay it, and after all that had been said against this bill, he was firmly convinced, that, so far from injuring the manufacture, it would thrive the better for this tax. He, on this account, hoped, that the bill would pass, in spite of his objection to some things that might, perhaps, be corrected. He then replied to the complaints of some gentlemen, who, as an excuse for repeating over and over again, their former arguments and opinions, observed, that they had not received an answer. It was very likely that they might think so, and he, for his part, did not think that he had been answered. This kind of reasoning had no end. Perhaps it was impossible for him, or gentlemen of his sentiments, to answer the opposite side of the question. And, again, perhaps the gentlemen of the opposite opinion could not answer them. The matter must rest there, and the question come to a vote.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was convinced that there was a deficiency, and a great one. But he was not fully prepared to speak upon the subject; though he was sure of the fact. He did not wish to hurry the subject. The bill might be printed. Mr. NICHOLAS was sorry to have learned that he had, on Saturday, made a general reflection on a profession of men. With some gentlemen, in the line referred to, he had as strict a friendship as with any persons on earth. He said, that ten lines of figures, which he had in his hand, would satisfy the House, that the taxes in the present bill are not wanted. He then began a detail of considerable length, to which Mr. FITZSIMONS replied.

Mr. TRACY. One gentleman says that we have a surplus of three millions; another, that we have a surplus of one million. It is very strange for gentlemen to be coming forward in this stage of the debate, and to say that money is not wanted, after the want of money has been so frequently advanced, and admitted, in the House. It is unaccountable, that there should be a contradiction on a point of this nature. He next went into a long series of calculations.

He objected to the estimate of the impost of 1793, that was reckoned upon for the current expenses of 1794. A great part of this impost was still due, by bonds. The persons who had given these bonds were, many of them, broke by the British depredations in the West Indies; and, in fact, a large proportion of that impost never would be paid in to the Collectors of the revenue.

He was displeased with the way in which some gentlemen had spoken of the national debt. He had no share, for his own part, as a creditor; but a part of his property must go to the discharge of it, and he should cheerfully pay it. He did not agree with those gentlemen who, in the event of a peace, would not wish to replenish the Treasury. It was curious, that the House had now been assembled for nearly six months; and that their chief object had been to discover ways and means for raising public money. A bill for that purpose had been brought in; and just when it was on the point of being passed, we make a sudden and wonderful discovery, that no money is wanted; but that we have an overplus of three millions of dollars. The thing cannot be. The calculations are not founded on truth. He did not believe that members understood the bill. He could demonstrate, that there was occasion for a supply of money.

Mr. MANISOX thought, that the arguments on each side of this question might be reduced to a narrow compass. If peace continues, he supposed it likely that the revenue would not fall so far short, as the Committee had apprehended. But if there was a war, the expense would much exceed anything yet thought of. He was for laying aside the subject at present, and if a rupture with England should ensue, he would then recommend, at once, a direct tax, and that these excise acts should be entirely thrown aside. If there was no war, he believed that no new taxes were required, let the matter, therefore die, as to the present. He disapproved the principle of the tax, and should, on that account, think himself justified in voting against it.

Mr. GILLOX rose, and replied to several gentlemen, who were for the excise on tobacco, snuff, and loaf and lump sugar; and observed, that he had partly obtained his object, by drawing gentlemen forward, with the calculations which had been kept back. But as the gentlemen, after having, by their own account, been three months on this subject, avowed that his request of detailing those large sums came rather unexpected, and that they wished to have more time to make their calculations, he had not much objection to let this bill have a second reading; but he hoped they would be accurate, in proportion to the time taken to preface them. As to the idea of our general taxes not taking place until the first of next March, that had no weight with him; because he knew the Civil List for the year was not all then due, nor would all the sum for military and naval preparations be to be paid down, the day the ore was dug for the guns, nor on the day that the first tree was cut to begin the frigates.

He agreed that the deficiency might arise on the supplies now due, for the terms which the gentlemen had assigned by the plunder of our merchants' property. He was happy to find that gentlemen had not lost sight of the serious applications they had received from that respectable and utile body (the merchants) for redress; and he should take care to remind gentlemen of their own observations, when the requests of the merchants were brought forward, as it was clear something must be done, either by restitution on the debts to be sequestered, a loan for them under the guarantee of the Union, or by prolonging the time to a remote period, of paying the duties that they owed. He was accused of making wonderful discoveries, of making calculations not founded in truth. The latter he denied, for, if there is any untruth in them, it cannot be on his side, but must have arisen from the Committee; therefore, to them be the untruth applicable, as he did not make use of a figure but what they placed in their report.

He still retained his opinion, that surplus revenue was dangerous in the hands of any Government. What did they want to do with it? He hoped nothing else but to buy up the national funded debt as cheap as they could, which act was pardonable, only by the intent, he presumed, they must feel of at last doing justice to our late armies. His meaning was, that the profits arising from this speculation should be kept as a sacred deposit, out at interest, and that interest due on employed towards paying off the interest due on the principal losses which our brave officers and soldiers had met with, by being obliged to part with their shares of pay at a very inferior value. This you may better pay to patriotism and misfortune, than pay to speculators.

Mr. TRACY. If I have said what is alleged, the language is too indecorous to be used by me, to any gentleman on this floor. If anything of that kind has escaped from me, I am ready to ask the gentleman's pardon. I have the highest respect for his character.

And the question was then put, Shall this bill be rejected? It passed in the negative—yeas 31, nays 66, as follows:

YEAS.—Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Abraham Clark, Isaac Coles, William Findley, William B. Van Allen, Peter Van Gaasbeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, John Watts, and Benjamin Williams.

The said bill was then read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Wednesday next.

The Whole House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act prohibiting, for a limited time, the exportation of arms and ammunition, and encouraging the importation of the same; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

The said bill was then read the third time, and passed.

Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the representation of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, concerning the expenses of certain expeditions carried on against the Indians since the year one thousand and seven hundred and eighty-five, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. GREENUP, Mr. HULLHOUSE, and Mr. VENABLE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. TALBOT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Lewis Deloiois, for his services in the late Army of the United States; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Joint Committee appointed to consider and report what further business is necessary to be done during the present session, and at what time it will be proper to adjourn the same, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the motion of the 12th instant, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Executives of the several States with a copy of the book marked A, deposited in the Treasury Department by the Commissioners who settled the accounts between the individual States and the United States, which lay on the table: Whereupon,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause such of the Executives of the several States as may apply for the same, to be furnished with a copy of the book marked A, deposited in the Treasury Department by the Commissioners who settled the accounts between the United States and the individual States.

AUGMENTATION OF THE ARMY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to augment the military force of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made amendment thereto; which was read, as follows:

Strike out the first section of the bill, in the words following, to wit:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be raised, for the term of — years, or during a war which may break out between the United States and any European Power, or additional military force, consisting of twenty-five thousand non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, together with a proper proportion of commissioned officers of all grades, respectively, according to the present Military Establishment of the United States."

And on the question that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in the said amendment, it was resolved in the affirmative.

A motion was then made and seconded to amend the said bill, by inserting, in lieu of the section stricken out, the following section, to wit:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there shall be raised, upon the terms and conditions hereafter mentioned, an additional provisional military force, to consist of — non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, together with a proper portion of commissioned officers."

It passed in the negative—yeas 30, nays 50, as follows:

And then the question being put that the said bill, as amended, be engrossed and read the third time, it passed in the negative. And so the said bill was rejected.

TUESDAY, May 20.

Mr. CARNES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers; which was read twice and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to report a bill to regulate the mode in which American seamen may be furnished with evidence of citizenship, for the purpose of protecting them against impressment in foreign service; and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. TRACY, and Mr. GILLOX, be the said committee.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill granting relief to James Bell; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. And, on the question that the said bill be engrossed and read the third time, it passed in the negative. And so the said bill was rejected.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In the communications which I have made to Congress during the present session relative to foreign nations, I have omitted no opportunity of testifying my anxiety to preserve the United States in peace. It is peculiarly, therefore, my duty, at this time, to lay before you the present state of certain hostile threats against the territories of Spain in our neighborhood.

The documents which accompany this Message develop the measures which I have taken to suppress them, and the intelligence which has been lately received.

It will be seen from thence that the subject has not been neglected; that every power vested in the Executive on such occasions has been exerted; and that there was reason to believe that the enterprise projected against the Spanish dominions was relinquished.

But it appears to have been revived upon principles which set public order at defiance, and place the peace of the United States in the discretion of unauthorized individuals. The means already deposited in the different departments of Government are shown, by experience, not to be adequate to these high exigencies, although such of them as are lodged in the hands of the Executive shall continue to be used with promptness, energy, and decision, proportioned to the case. But I am impelled, by the position of our public affairs, to recommend that provision be made for a stronger and more vigorous opposition than can be given to such hostile movements under the laws, as they now stand.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, May 20, 1794.

The Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to compensate Arthur St. Clair; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

It was then moved and seconded to amend the said bill at the Clerk's table, by striking out the second clause, in the words following, to wit:

"That he be further allowed at the rate of — dollars per day, from the tenth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight, to the — day of May, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, being the time he was employed in the business of Indian treaties, and till the delivery of the said treaties to the President of the United States."

And on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 25, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS.—Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Caines, Thomas Claiborne, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, George Dent, James Gordon, George Hancock, James Hillhouse, John Hunter, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Francis Preston, Israel Smith, Zephaniah Swift, Uriah Tracy, Thomas Tredwell, John E. Van Allen, Francis Walker, Benjamin Williams, and Joseph Winston—27.

THE HOUSE resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Lewis Dubois, for his services in and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act to make provision for the widow and orphan children of Robert Forsyth, who was killed in the service of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

And on the question that the said bill be read the third time, it passed in the negative—yeas 37, nays 40, as follows:

Another motion was then made and seconded to amend the said bill, by striking out, in the third clause, the words "for a negro killed in defence of the public stores, the sum of two hundred dollars." And on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said bill, as amended, be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

WEDNESDAY, May 21.

An engrossed bill to compensate Arthur St. Clair was read the third time and passed, by the following vote:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, Theodore Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, John Beatty, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, Thomas P. Caines, Gabriel Christie, Abraham Clark, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Ezekiel Gilbert, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, Alexander Gillon, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Lewis Dubois, for his services in and after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. CLARK, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act to make provision for the widow and orphan children of Robert Forsyth, who was killed in the service of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

And on the question that the said bill be read the third time, it passed in the negative—yeas 37, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, Thomas P. Caines, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, William J. Resolved, That the said bill be rejected.

An engrossed bill to authorize the settlement of the account of Lewis Dubois, for his services in the late Army of the United States, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to alter the time for the next annual meeting of Congress was read the third time and passed.

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on the third day of June next.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you, in confidence, sundry papers, by which you will perceive the state of affairs between us and the Six Nations, and the probable cause to which it is owing; and, also, certain information, whereby it would appear that some encroachment was about to be made on our territory by an officer and party of British troops. Proceeding upon a supposition of the authenticity of this information, although of a private nature, I have caused the representation to be made to the British Minister, a copy of which accompanies this Message.

It cannot be necessary to comment upon the very serious nature of such an encroachment, nor to urge that this new state of things suggests the propriety of placing the United States in a posture of effectual preparation for an event which, notwithstanding the endeavors making to avert it, may, by circumstances beyond our control, be forced upon us.

UNITED STATES, May 21, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to be committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

THURSDAY, May 22.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill laying duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed to examine into the state of the Treasury Department, and to report generally and specially thereupon, made a report; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have disagreed to the resolution of this House for furnishing the Executives of the several States with a copy of the book marked A, deposited in the Treasury Department by the Commissioners who settled the accounts between the United States and the individual States. The Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, authorizing the President of the Senate and SPEAKER of the House of Representatives to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the third day of June next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Attorney-General accompanying a table of costs and fees for the Courts of the United States, made in pursuance of the resolution of this House, of the eleventh of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. BOUNDNOT, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. KITTERA.

FRIDAY, May 23.

Mr. LYMAN, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants of Salem, Beverly, and Danvers, in the State of Massachusetts, made a report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the bounty allowed by law to vessels employed in the bank or cod fisheries of the United States, in lieu of a drawback of the duty on salt, be extended to, and include all vessels of more than thirty, and not exceeding seventy tons admeasurement.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. LYMAN, Mr. WINDFORD, and Mr. HOLLEN, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. NEVILLE, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental Establishment, to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Scioto," reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice and referred.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the motion of the twelfth instant, for the acceptance of a cession by the State of New York, of a piece of land at Montauk Point; also, the exemplification of an act of the Legislature of the said State, transmitted by a written Message from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES of the twenty-seventh of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas, and the same being twice read, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The said bill was then further amended, and together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before you the copy of a Letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, in answer to a Letter from the Secretary of State, communicated to Congress yesterday; and also, the copy of a Letter from the Secretary, which is referred to in the above mentioned Letter of the Minister.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, May 23, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a Committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills allowing further compensation for the services of Robert Forsyth, late Marshal of the District of Georgia; and that Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. CLAIBORNE, and Mr. CADWALLADER, do prepare and bring in the same.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, until the Government of Great Britain shall make or give satisfactory assurances to the President of the United States of their intention to make full and ample compensation for all injuries done by the ships of war and privateers of that nation, to the citizens of the United States, since the eighth day of June last, all commercial intercourse between the United States and the islands and colonies of the British King in the West Indies, and on the Continent of America, shall be prohibited; and during the continuance of such prohibition, no ship or vessel, owned wholly or in part, by any subject of the King of Great Britain, shall be allowed to load in, or sail from, any port in the United States, with any article or articles of provision:

The previous question was called for by five members, to wit: "Shall the main question to agree to the said resolution be now put?" And, on the previous question, "Shall the said main question be now put?" it passed in the negative—yeas 24, nays 46, as follows:

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, John Beatty, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, Abraham Clark, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, Andrew Gregg, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, John Wilkes Kittera, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, William Lyman, Francis Malbone, William Montgomery, Peter Muhlenberg, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Josiah Parker, Francis Preston, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, John S. Sherburne, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, Philip Van Cortlandt, Peter Van Gassbeck, Abraham Venable, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and John Watts.

TOBACCO AND SUGAR DUTIES.

The House went into a Committee, Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair, on the bill for an excise on tobacco, snuff, and refined sugar.

In the first section it was agreed to strike out the words, "tobacco and." This proposed that the word tobacco be struck out in every subsequent part of the bill, so that the duty be confined to the manufacture of snuff.

Mr. MURLEBERG (the SPEAKER) moved to strike out the second section, viz: "that from and after the — day of — there be levied, collected, and paid, upon all sugar which shall be refined within the United States, a duty of two cents per pound."

He would not trouble the Committee with any comments on the excise, enough having already been said on that subject; although he could not forbear mentioning, that in England, where almost every thing was subject to an excise, and where the Minister is ever on the watch to discover new articles for that purpose, that loaf sugar had never yet been taxed, the Committee on Ways and Means had all the credit of the seasonable discovery. The reason for not attempting an excise on this article was obvious, because the manufacture employed a greater quantity of shipping than any other, they therefore rather wished to encourage than to depress it; the former of which they effectually do, by allowing a generous drawback on exportation of refined sugar, for which the different ports of the Continent afford them a constant and ready market. The case was widely different here. The manufacture is yet in its infant state—it has to contend with the old established ones in Europe, who have larger capitals and can afford longer credits, whereas we have not only no market to export it to, but even now already, can annually make a quantity more than sufficient for the consumption of the United States. It is true, it appears from the last returns, that upwards of 200,000 lbs. of refined sugars, were imported last year, which is about the same quantity which two houses might furnish in one year, but it is to be observed, that owing to the high price of raw sugars, some establishments were not worked at all, whilst others did not work above eight or nine months in the year, and I will here, said Mr. M., venture to assert, that if this duty of two cents actually takes place, some of those who are now engaged in this difficult and expensive business will abandon it and turn their capitals into other channels. I do not stand alone in this opinion, others, of more experience join me, and it is founded on the following incontrovertible facts. Raw sugars have for several years past been so high, that refined sugars naturally bore an equally high price. This has already lessened the consumption, to a considerable degree in the United States, and from the present prospect before us, when the French islands are in the hands of the British, the probability is, that they will rather be higher than lower; and if the two cents be added to the present high price of refined sugars, the consumption will still be lessened in the same proportion as the price of the article increases. This observation is founded on facts, which every person concerned in the business has felt, and daily experiences; nay, it can be proved, however strange it may appear, that a less quantity of refined sugar is consumed at present in the United States, than a year or two before the Revolution. Again, owing to the high price of refined sugars, and which must still be higher when this duty takes place, many even of our opulent families, have, in a great degree, abandoned the use of it, and substituted the white Havana, or the white East India sugar. I well remember a remarkable instance of this kind which took place not many months ago in this city. A gentleman having imported a considerable quantity of white East Indies sugar, sold it to the refiners of this place. Before the sale was concluded, he reserved a quantity for himself and an opulent friend of his. The consequence was that neither himself nor his friend used the year before.

Permit me to add another circumstance. Sugars are higher at present, and from a variety of circumstances must continue to be higher here than in England, and although an additional duty on imported loaf and lump sugar may take place, unless it exceeds what I have yet heard mentioned they will be able to undersell the manufacturers here, and this from the single circumstance of their being allowed a drawback of 26s. sterling per cwt., for if even a drawback of the same sum was allowed us here, which is not to be expected, it cannot operate, because we have no market for this article. In the West Indies, it is well known to be contraband, and to transport it to Europe, would be carrying water into the ocean, and even then it could not be accomplished on as low terms as the Europeans can afford to do it.

One fact more, equally incontrovertible, suffer me to add. By the additional duty on coal, which I am far from disapproving, because I wish to encourage the consumption of our home productions, you have, in fact, laid an additional tax on sugar. Every work of this kind consumes annually from 2,000 to 4,000 bushels. This article was heretofore at the rate of eleven pence or one shilling per bushel; owing to the duty on imported coal, it has now risen to 2s. to 2s. 3d. This naturally enhances the price of the article made in this manufacture, which is already burdened to a considerable degree with taxes or duties. Thus, there is a duty on the raw material, a duty on the paper they use, a duty on the twine, a duty on the coal, and, to crown all, a duty is intended on the article produced in this devoted manufacture. If it is thus, my friend from Connecticut means to do us good, or if this is the decided encouragement and protection my colleague means to yield us, it is such a one as I am sure the manufacturer will not thank him for.

Sir, I could add that this bill partakes strongly of the nature of a sumptuary law; that in case of a war it will not produce you any revenue, because the supplies of the raw material are too irregular, and no other but imported sugar is refined, which already pays a duty—and that by this duty you not only lessen the consumption, but also increase the number of those who cannot pay for it; but I forbear to trespass any longer on the patience of the Committee on this subject.

But, Mr. Chairman, we want money to build our frigates and arsenals, to fortify our ports and harbors, and to release our unfortunate brethren in captivity. We want revenues. If this really be the intention of the Committee, and not merely to establish the principle of excise on home manufactures, no one will join more cheerfully in such measures as shall appear most prudent and most likely to obtain the object, and which, in my opinion, will neither injure the commerce of this country, nor in an equal degree the manufactures, nor indeed the poorer sort of the community who consume the article of sugar.

By the last returns which I could lay my hands on, it appears that there are annually imported into the United States upwards of twenty-five millions of pounds of sugar, and from the same returns it appears that about four or four and a half millions are exported, which are allowed a drawback of the duty on exportation; thus then there are upwards of twenty millions of pounds annually consumed in the United States.

You have, in the late impost bill, imposed an additional duty of one cent per pound on coffee; half that sum additional duty on raw sugar will yield you upwards of 100,000 dollars. This then will at once yield you the sum which the Committee expected from an excise both on sugar and manufactured tobacco, and will neither injure the merchant, nor in an equal degree the manufacturer, nor indeed the poor; the latter, and in my opinion none but the idle can be so, as well as many others, have long since substituted molasses for all the purposes for which they heretofore used sugar; besides which the American sugar is daily getting more into use, and bids fair to become general, at least at and near the frontiers.

When, therefore, it is considered that this manufacture is yet in its infancy in the United States, that it has to contend with the old established ones in Europe, that there is no excise on this article in England, that this manufacture employs a great quantity of tonnage; that raw sugars are high here, and comparatively low in Europe, that there is a drawback in England, which operates as a bounty, and which from local situations cannot operate if even granted, with the same advantage here; when it is reduced to a certainty that the duty will operate injuriously on the manufactures here; and when it appears that double the sum can be raised by a trifling additional duty on raw sugar, without any additional expense or inconvenience, and which will effectually remove the evils complained of, I flatter myself the motion will prevail.

Mr. FRIZZMONS objected to the proposal of the SPEAKER, for a tax of half a cent per pound on common sugar imported. The unrefined sugar formed a considerable portion of the subsistence of the poor. Formerly, the price of it was not more than six pence (currency,) but it is now twelve pence, per pound. The coffee duty was another, to which Mr. F. had felt reluctance, because coffee is an article of universal consumption, and the tax upon it falls where taxes ought not to fall, that is upon the poor; but there is no help for it. He would, if possible, have avoided this tax, for coffee, formerly eleven pence or a shilling per pound, has risen to one shilling and ten pence. Mr. F. said, that we are able to lay a heavy enough tax on imported sugar, effectually to protect our own sugar refiners. It had been said that the two cents per pound of duty would make it requisite for the refiners to augment their capitals. This he could not believe, because the Executive gives credit to the manufacturers for the payment of the duty. Mr. F. said, that the time was perhaps not distant, when we shall be obliged to seek sugar in the East Indies. Britain has acquired the West Indies, which will increase the difficulties of this country in obtaining it from that part of the world.

Mr. M'DOWELL hoped that the section would be struck out. He objected to the principle of the bill. He considered it as highly impolitic to tax the infant manufactures of America. He would rather, if the Public Treasury could afford it, give a premium for the encouragement of our manufactures upon Europe. This dependence of ours has repeatedly been urged as a reason why the House ought not to adopt certain commercial regulations and restrictions. Some gentlemen had undertaken to prove that the manufacturers would be benefited by such laws, an assertion which he considered as very extraordinary. The manufacturers themselves understood their business best, and thought quite otherwise. This tax will not only alarm those already engaged, but will prevent other men of enterprise and capital from engaging in manufactures, when they find that the moment their business becomes profitable, they are to be taxed.

He could not help remarking upon some observations that fell from his friend, [Mr. BALDWIN, from Georgia,] when this subject was before the Committee some days ago. It had been objected that the bill was not well founded, as it established a new principle; and the member [Mr. BALDWIN,] replied, that it was not new, as there was already an excise fixed on ardent spirits. He had opposed that law, but since it was passed, he could not object to the present bill. Had the gentleman reflected, he would have seen that there was equal reason for resisting this bill, because it fixed that obnoxious principle more strongly, by giving a further sanction to an American excise. Mr. M'D. also considered the tax to be unnecessary. The tax was contemplated on the prospect of a war which has now become less likely, the British having since the Orders of the 8th of January, relaxed their depredations. Further, the tax was unnecessary, because, it was asserted by several very well informed merchants, that the amount of the impost this year would exceed that of the last.

On dividing, the motion for striking out the clause was rejected—Ayes 31, nays 45.

Mr. M'ULLENBERG then stated a variety of inaccuracies in the wording of the bill. The word boiler was applied, as if it meant a pot for boiling the sugar. The word meant the superintendent of the operation, and Mr. M. presumed that the House did not intend to treat him, as specified in the bill. He wrote over the whole clause anew, and his alterations were agreed to.

The Committee rose, and the Chairman reported the amendments to the House, which were agreed to.

Ordered, That the said bill, with amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

SATURDAY, May 24.

An engrossed bill for determining the Northern boundary of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas, was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill, laying certain duties upon manufactured tobacco and refined sugar, was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, enclosing a letter from him to the Secretary of War, and the answer thereto, respecting a claim for three horses killed in the action with the Indians, on the fourth of November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to make further compensation for the services of the late Robert Forsyth, Marshal of Georgia; which was read twice and referred.

Ordered, That the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the President of the UNITED STATES, of the eighteenth of March last, relative to an advance of money requested by the Minister of the French Republic, which lay on the table, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Mr. FIDLER, from the committee to whom were referred the laws of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, passed the first day of August, one thousand seven hundred ninety-two, made a report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force the act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt." The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act further extending the time for receiving on loan the Domestic Debt of the United States;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were severally read twice, and ordered to be read the third time on Monday next.

An engrossed bill, laying certain duties upon manufactured tobacco and refined sugar, was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the UNITED STATES, during the recess of the present Congress, to cause to be purchased or built a number of vessels, to be equipped as galleys in the service of the United States." The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for extending the benefit of a drawback and terms of credit in certain cases, and for other purposes;" to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were severally read twice and referred.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. MADISON moved, that a late Message from the President, which had been referred to a select committee, be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. The Message was relative to an advance of money to the Ambassador of the Republic of France. Some time ago, it had been found that there was no money in the Treasury, but what had been appropriated. There is now money unappropriated. This Message was made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. M'DOWELL laid on the table a resolution, instructing the Secretary of the Treasury to lay before the House, on the second Monday after the meeting of the next session of Congress, a statement of the balances remaining due from individuals to the United States, distinguishing between those due under the late, and the present Government, and whether any, and what steps, have been taken to recover the same; and also a statement of the sums of public money intrusted to the hands of individuals under the late Government, which have not been accounted for.

SNUFF AND SUGAR DUTIES.

The House then took up the bill for laying a duty on snuff and refined sugar. Several clauses were discussed. It was moved that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House. Agreed. The House went into a Committee immediately—Mr. PARKER in the Chair. After some conversation, the Chairman reported the bill to the House, without amendment.

THE EMBARGO.

Mr. GILLON rose and adverted to the correspondence that had been read yesterday, between Mr. RANDOLPH and Mr. HAMMOND. He had been called on by five shipmasters with a petition to Congress, which was read by the Clerk, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. G. then made a motion for the renewal of the Embargo. For this, he assigned several reasons.

Mr. GOODHUE wished for an immediate discussion of this question. A resolution of the same nature had some time ago received the consideration of the House. He supposed that it had been considered thus early, in order that it might reach the distant parts of the Union. He was then in the small minority for continuing it, but a great majority of the House were of a different opinion. In consequence of that decision, he took it for granted that the merchants had made their arrangements, and it appeared to him, to be somewhat trifling with them, under such circumstances, to make this proposal, and especially as the present Embargo expires to-morrow. It will be impossible for us now to renew it so as to prevent the vessels of the Union from going out, unless it be from the port of Philadelphia.

Mr. CLARK was for deferring the discussion till Monday. The captains of the vessels can, in the meantime, if they please, embargo themselves.

Mr. BORDINOR was against it at present. It would have been much better to have continued it. It would be unequal to lay it on here to-day, while vessels at the same time would be sailing from New York.

Mr. PARKER felt it impossible to form a judgment on this question so suddenly. It was perhaps as important a one as had ever come before that House. He wished to have time to think of it. At present, he could not venture to give an opinion.

Upon this, Mr. GILLON, with leave of the House, withdrew his motion, with the intention of renewing it on Monday.

MONDAY, May 26.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to continue in force the act for the relief of persons imprisoned for debt," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act further extending the time for receiving on loan the Domestic Debt of the United States," was read the third time and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the Pres-

SIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES of the eighteenth March last, relative to an advance of money requested by the Minister of the French Republic; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before this House such information, respecting any loans negotiated in Europe for the United States, as he may be possessed of, and which has not already been laid before the Legislature, and the purposes to which they stand appropriated.

STAMP DUTIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill laying duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House. And, on the question that the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 44, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, John Beatty, Lambert Cadwalader, Abraham Clark, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, William J. Dawson, Jonathan Dayton, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, James Gillespie, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Samuel Griffin, William B. Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing a settlement of certain expenses of the Commissioners of Loans." The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act allowing an additional compensation to the principal Clerks in the Department of State, and in the Treasury and War Departments, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four," to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were severally read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental Establishment, to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Scioto," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The Commissioners of his Catholic Majesty having communicated to the Secretary of State the form of a certificate, without which the vessels of the United States cannot be admitted into the ports of Spain, I think it proper to lay it before Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, May 26, 1794.

The said Message and certificate were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill providing for the payment of the second instalment due on a loan made of the Bank of the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and were discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was recommitted to Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. GILES, and Mr. MONTGOMERY.

TUESDAY, May 27.

SOLDIERS' LAND TITLES.

The bill respecting the settlement of the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on the Territory Northwest of the Ohio, being read the third time,

Mr. BALDWIN objected to the passage of this bill, as a total departure from the former principles of the old Congress on this question. He had many reasons for opposing it. He was sorry that he had not done so yesterday, when it was before a Committee of the Whole. He recommended, in place of this bill, that there should rather be provisions correcting the former proceedings on the subject.

Mr. NICHOLAS replied, that gentlemen divide their efforts so strangely, that business cannot be got through. The member had not examined the bill, or he must have seen that his objections never would apply. By it, the public never could be defrauded of an acre of land. As far as the officers and soldiers cannot be provided for on the Southwest side of the Ohio, they must have settlements on the Northwest. There is not room for them on the former side, and therefore they must be settled on the other. There was no reason to doubt the propriety of this measure. He enlarged on the necessity for this allocation, and on the security which the public had of their not being defrauded.

Mr. BALDWIN repeated his reasons for disapproving of the bill, and attempted to demonstrate that there was no satisfactory evidence of necessity for granting this second allocation of lands. He was convinced that there had been a total departure from the old principles. If there was not a great hurry about the bill, he could wish it to be deferred.

Mr. CLARK did not think the checks in the bill sufficient. He specified certain descriptions of persons, who might get lands to which they were not entitled.

Mr. NICHOLAS read a part of the bill to show that there could be no imposition. Here is a plain law, which no man's understanding can depart from. There was not the shadow of a pretence to object to this bill. The old Congress did acknowledge the necessity for such a location as was now proposed, because, without it, there was not a sufficiency of land. A passage from the proceedings of the old Congress, which Mr. N. read, stated the absolute necessity for it.

Mr. VENABLE said, that many of these settlers had already spent more time and money in prosecuting these claims, than the lands themselves, if they should at this moment receive them, were worth. He was for the bill.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was on the same side of the question. He said that three hundred of the persons in question had settled themselves on the Northwest of the Ohio, and wanted the rights to their respective lands.

Mr. FITZSIMONS also recommended the passing of the bill.

Mr. GILES.—Much had been said about the survey of these lands, as if it had not been accurate. He knew the gentlemen who had made it, and they were of the most respectable character. There was not in America, he believed, a better man than the gentleman who was at the head of it; so that it was entirely out of place to be coming forward now, and saying that the survey was wrong. An idea had gone abroad, that the North Carolina line was not completed, but the member affirmed that it has been so. Many will not be at the expense requisite for accepting of these lands and taking out of patents. The old law quoted by his colleague [Mr. NICHOLAS] had acknowledged the survey to be right. Mr. G. himself once had a claim for some of these lands. But he would rather give it up than be at so much expense and trouble about it. This was a very hard case on many persons. They had sold their property on the old settled lands, went to the new allocation, in confidence on public faith, and now cannot get their rights. He hoped, therefore, that the bill would pass, or, that the gentlemen on the opposite side would show some other remedy for this grievance.

On putting the question, fifty-five gentlemen arose in favor of the bill. It accordingly passed.

STAMP DUTIES.

An engrossed bill, laying duties on stamped vellum, parchment, and paper, was read the third time, and on the question that the said bill do pass, it passed in the negative—yeas 32, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS.—James Armstrong, John Beatty, Lambert Cadwalader, Abraham Clark, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, William J. Dawson, George Dent, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, James Gillespie, Alexander Gillon, Benjamin Goodhue, William B. Grove, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, John Wilkes Kitter, Henry Latimer, William Montgomery, William Vass Murray, Andrew Pickens, Theodore Sedgwick, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gasbeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and Richard Winn.

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, Theodorus Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Elias Boudinot, Benjamin Bourne, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Isaac Coles, Henry Dearborn, William Findley, William B. Giles, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, George Hancock, Daniel Heister, Amasa Learned, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Francis Malbone, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Melrose, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, Joseph Neville, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Francis Preston, Robert Rutherford, Thomas Scott, John Smilie, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, William Smith, Thomas Sprigg, Uriah Tracy, Thomas Tredwell, Jonathan Trumbull, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Francis Walker, John Watts, Benjamin Williams, and Joseph Winston.

And so the said bill was rejected.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, pursuant to the resolution of yesterday; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 18th of March last, relative to an advance of money requested by the Minister Plenipotentiary of the French Republic.

Mr. SEDGWICK, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill providing for the payment of the second instalment due on a Loan made to the Bank of the United States, made a report; which was read, and, together with the said bill, ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, May 28.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday, by the Committee of the Whole House, to the bill laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons; and, the same being read, some were agreed to, and others disagreed to.

The said bill was then further amended, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the registration and protection of American seamen; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill laying duties on licenses for selling wines and distilled spirituous liquors by retail; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. SEDGWICK then moved that the House should take up the subject of the Bank instalments, as it would require but a few minutes.

Mr. GILES, the Message of the PRESIDENT, as to the application of the French Ambassador for money; and

Mr. McDOWELL the bill for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern Territory.

The three members rose all at the same time, and were each of them equally anxious for preference, in the priority of discussion. A preference was given to Mr. McDOWELL's motion. This bill had been frequently postponed, while the people for whose safety it is intended had been, during many years, liable to incessant alarm from the savages, and if anything was to be done at all, it was proper that it should be done now. The House resolved itself into a Committee on the bill, (Mr. PARKER in the Chair.) After some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported an amendment to the bill, which was negatived in the House. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

Mr. SEDGWICK then moved that the House go into a Committee on the bill providing for the payment of the second instalment due on the Loan from the Bank of the United States. Agreed to, (Mr. PARKER in the Chair.) After making some amendments, the Committee rose, and reported the same to the House.

ADVANCE OF MONEY TO FRANCE.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 18th of March last, relative to an advance of money requested by the Minister of the French Republic.

Mr. GILES offered the following motion:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized and requested to apply the proceeds of the Loan of three millions of florins, lately obtained in Holland, towards the discharge of the debt remaining due to France; or to the protection and defence of the United States, if, in his opinion, the same should be found necessary for that purpose, any appropriation to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. HILLHOUSE was of opinion, that, before any payments in advance should be made to the French Minister, it was proper to secure the indemnification of our own citizens, who had sustained such immense losses by the detention of their vessels in the ports of the Republic, both in Europe and the West Indies. Mr. H. here made a distinction, that if the term stipulated for payment of an instalment to France had actually arrived, he would have made that payment, though they had burnt our ships, and have sought redress in the ordinary way. But when they come forward before the money is due, and make such a requisition, he thought it a fair opportunity to secure the claims of American citizens.

Mr. NICHOLAS was in favor of the motion. He felt, as an American, that the cause of this country, and of France were inseparably connected; and that giving the money to the Republic was equivalent to expending it in the service of the United States. He reminded the House of the indelible obligations of America to France. That the Republic is now reduced to distress, as this country was when supported by the French arms. Every principle of humanity, of honor, of gratitude, and of justice, calls upon us to give that nature the most effectual support in our power.

Mr. FITZSIMONS.—The Americans have applied to M. Fauchet, for payment in this country. He has assured them that he cannot give it, but that he will inform the French Government of their application. They are satisfied to wait for the reply to the Minister, which is expected from Europe.

Mr. AMES remarked, that, as the three millions of florins had been loaned in Holland for the defence of this country, it would be something worse than imprudence to give it away for any other purpose. The cause of France does not depend on her receiving a million of dollars. She is in a much better situation to give us that sum, than we are to advance it for her. He did not think that, to keep our money to ourselves, and to bestow it upon France, were the same thing, nor did he believe that it would be so considered by the citizens of the United States. He could not approve the motion.

Mr. GILLON thought that, as to the claims of American citizens, a complete answer had been given by the member from Pennsylvania. If the merchants themselves are willing to wait for an answer from France, nobody else has any concern with the matter. He rejected the idea of not paying the money to the French until it was due, unless with a restriction in favor of the American claimants. The money due to France had been advanced by her in the time of our utmost distress. It was at present wanted for her own defence. To indulge us, indeed, she had formerly granted a longer time than she was obliged to grant for the repayment. But if necessity compelled her to solicit an abridgment of that indulgence, is it consistent with the feelings of honor and generosity, to refuse her such a request?

Mr. WADSWORTH was too ill-informed upon this question, to know upon what side he ought to vote. Much had been said about the gratitude due from this country to France. We had been grateful, indeed, since we had suffered them for a long time past to plunder our vessels without making a complaint. He stated that the American property seized in the ports of France amounted to one million of dollars, and that taken by her in the West India Colonies, to four millions of dollars. Much of this property had been paid for in such a way, that the owners did not realize more than twenty-five per cent. of its value. The present application had been made a long time ago, and Mr. W. did not suppose that the French Minister could, at present, be in any want of the money. Since the time when he first sought for it, something had happened which altered the case. The greatest portion of specie in America is now at the command of M. Fauchet. There can be, therefore, no pretence for giving away this million of dollars on the plea of necessity. The Republic herself possesses, if we are to believe common fame, more cash than all the Kings in Europe; and though the story may be very greatly exaggerated, yet make allowance for exaggeration, and still her treasures are very great. No part of her misfortunes can be ascribed to the want of money. Matters so standing, he thought that it was our duty to make a halt, and begin to take some care of the interest of our fellow-citizens. As for gratitude towards the Republic, he felt as much of that sentiment as those who talked more about it than he did. But he had not learned any good reason why this money should be disposed of in this way; and he could not agree to vote so great a sum where he could not see the need.

Mr. BOYDRE said, that the purposes for which it had been first asked, had been long since accomplished without it. The transportation of the emigrants of St. Domingo to France had been given as a reason for this request, but they were all gone already.

Mr. SEDGWICK and Mr. GOODHUE also spoke. The resolution was carried in the Committee, and reported to the House, where it was likewise carried; and it was Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. BEATTY, and Mr. HEISTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

THURSDAY, May 29.

TAX ON CARRIAGES.

An engrossed bill, laying duties upon carriages for the conveyance of persons, was read the third time, and Ordered, That the first section thereof be committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the said section; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the section committed to them under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said section, as amended, be presently engrossed; and, the said section being accordingly brought in engrossed,

Mr. MADISON objected to this tax on carriages as an unconstitutional tax; and, as an unconstitutional measure, he would vote against it.

Mr. AMES said, that it was not to be wondered at if he, coming from so different a part of the country, should have a different idea of this tax from the gentleman who spoke last. In Massachusetts, this tax had been long known; and there it was called an excise. It was difficult to define whether a tax is direct or not. The duty falls not himself that this was not so. The duty falls not on the possession, but the use; and it is very easy to insert a clause to that purpose, which will satisfy the gentleman himself. Mr. MADISON had said that the introduction of this tax would break down one of the safeguards of the Constitution. Mr. A. really saw very little danger to the Constitution from it.

Mr. MADISON explained.

The said bill was then read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 49, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, Theodorius Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, John Beatty, Benjamin Bourne, Thomas P. Caines, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Colt, Jonathan Dayton, George Deut, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, James Gillespie, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Andrew Gregg, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, John Hunter, John Wilkes Kittere, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, Francis Malbone, Alexander Mebane, William Vans Murray, Nathaniel Niles, Andrew Pickens, Robert Rutherford, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. SUNDAY BILLS.

An engrossed bill for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern Frontier settlers was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill providing for the report of the second instalment due on a Loan made of the Bank of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the motion of the twelfth instant for the acceptance of a cession by the State of New York of a piece of land at Montauk Point. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be authorized to receive cessions of land from any State to the United States, for the purpose of erecting light-houses or beacons, notwithstanding the jurisdiction of the State may be reserved, except so far as respects the real or personal property of the United States.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, and Mr. TREDWELL, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill providing for the payment of a certain sum of money to the French Republic; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill laying duties on property sold at auction; which was read twice and committed.

NON-INTERCOURSE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. GOODHUE moved, that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, to take into consideration a bill empowering the PRESIDENT to lay on an Embargo, in the recess of Congress, if in his judgment the public exigencies should render it necessary.

The House accordingly went into a Committee, Mr. PARKER in the Chair. Some amendments were made, and reported, and the House took them up.

Mr. GILLOX observed, that this bill afforded him an opportunity of expressing his acquiescence in the propriety of an Embargo, to be laid by the PRESIDENT, as exigencies should require. He was attached to the principle of the bill, and thought that every addition, which could be useful, ought to be ingrafted on it; he therefore embraced the present opportunity of bringing forward the resolution that he had laid upon the table on Saturday last, for a renewal of the Embargo. The motion was, in substance, that from and after the 10th day of June next, the Embargo shall be renewed. He thought that this motion was a matter that required a discussion, and an immediate decision, as many minds were afloat respecting it. It might be expected, that many remarks would be made in support of this clause being added to the bill; but, when gentlemen recollect that the principles of this measure must have been fully investigated when the question of an Embargo was first contemplated, and that in its renewal similar observations were made, he conceived that a repetition of these principles was unnecessary, as the session was closing. Yet, as some new matters had arisen, he would make some observations on them, in a very brief manner.

He had always held the doctrine, that, in many cases, the voice of their constituents ought to be the guide of the House. This case embraced that idea. He presumed that their constituents were as able to make observations, and to obtain information, as they were; therefore, when our constituents form an opinion, are not we, asked Mr. G., bound to listen to it? Ought we not to re-examine the case? Surely we ought; especially when our constituents publicly assemble together on the subject, hold solemn debates, form resolves, publish them, and transmit them not only to their own Representatives, but having fully as much confidence in the Representatives of other States, transmit authenticated copies to them also—ought not the House to deem such actions very nearly verging to instructions? Possessed with this idea, Mr. G. said, that it became his duty to press forward a renewal of the Embargo, because the purpose for which it was first laid on had not been obtained, and because new informations are received of the condemnation of a large property, that we were in hopes would have been released by the Orders of the 8th of January, from the Court of London.

The House had been applied to by various meetings of their constituents, from one end of the Continent to the other, to continue the Embargo, and all approving of the former conduct of the Legislature in laying it on; and they had not been applied to by any persons, except some under this roof, to discontinue it. He called on gentlemen to come forward, as he should, with the information that they had all received from their constituents, either for or against the measure. This would bring forward the sense of the constituents, as well as of their Representatives; and having made this call, Mr. G. said, that he should now explain the sense of his own constituents wherein they were expressed in the documents which he had produced to the House from a very respectable number of merchants in Charleston; they are further stated to you by the resolves of the meeting in Pinckney district, a very large district on the coast of South Carolina, which contains upwards of twenty-eight thousand white persons. How many were present Mr. G. knew not, but their resolves breathe an approbation of the Embargo and of its continuance, with an assurance of their determination to support our merchants in their just demand of restitution. Therefore, he should vote for the Embargo to be renewed on the 10th of June next, as supported by a member from New Jersey.

But other reasons occurred, when the subject was under discussion last week. It was observed, that a continuation of the Embargo might work an injury to our allies. He declared himself one of the last men who would hazard any step to injure the interest of our worthy allies, whose acts of friendship to us during the last war had perhaps proved the best props to our seats under this roof. But exceptions might be introduced, to qualify this clause in such a way as not to affect them, by permitting produce to be exported in American bottoms for the French Government, and, if necessary, under convoy. He observed, also, that as many of the French islands were lately captured by the British, no plea could be introduced for supplying them, unless we meant to hold out to the world that we were determined to do good for evil; that is, to furnish the conquerors with all which they needed, to enable them to recommence their depredations against our commerce; for, without our supplies, they could not keep their privateers out. The crops in France were advancing; by which, with the late supplies gone and going from hence, he thought that our allies would not be in want. For these reasons, he did not see how the Embargo could operate as an injury to our allies. But, sir, said Mr. G., let us examine the situation of our merchants. They have applied to you for redress. They have no other appeal to make but to you, where cognizance can be taken of their case. What have you done? There is on your table a resolve to guarantee a general indemnification to them, and another to sequester the British debts; but, as a member [Mr. CLARK] formerly said, they are taking a nap: I rather think that it will be the sleep of death.

If merchants cannot insure their property, they may think of doing as is done in other countries; that is, arm their vessels to defend their property. Have they not a right, sir, to do it? Can you prevent it? No. Well, then, they meet with British privateers; of course they defend themselves, and are likely captured; the treatment which they receive compels you to send to demand your citizens, as was the case in Captain Barney's late capture. The British refuse. Why, sir, the very necessity of a just armistice, which you can form no law to prevent, brings you into what every prudent American would wish to avoid—a war—with any Power.

There is another reason. If the Embargo is not renewed, how are your suffering merchants to be reinstated in their losses? America will not pay them out of her Treasury. You will not make a Loan for them, as I proposed the other day. You will not even extend the time of their paying their dues to your Treasury, as I also proposed. But you let slip through your hands, by the Embargo being off, the only certain fund of restitution, viz. the British property, public and private, now in America; and when that is once gone, to what are the merchants to have recourse? Behold the late correspondence between your Secretary of State and the British Minister here! The instant that you apply for explanations on their troops advancing on your Territories, under Colonel Simcoe, the Minister replies, with a string of retorts on you, just as his Court will do to your Ambassador, Mr. Jay. And here I aver it, as a matter of fact, that when he demands restitution, they will come forward with their demands. The first will be, payment of the prizes sold in America, that were brought in by French cruisers. In what way are you to comply? Surely our citizens are not to be taxed for it. Of course, they refuse you any restitution. Therefore, we are brought under the favorite two words of the official correspondence alluded to—statu quo. Yes, a truly statu quo; things to remain in the same state as they are at present. The British have plundered you of your property; they keep it in statu quo. Well, you have got hold of their property here; keep that also in statu quo, by renewing the Embargo, till you have proofs from your Minister Extraordinary that your merchants will receive the damages that they are entitled to for their property captured from them, whilst they were trading under the protection of your laws, and the laws of nations.

The amendment offered by Mr. GILLOX was negatived, without a division or any further debate; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

INVALID PENSIONS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom were referred two reports of the Secretary for the Department of War, respecting the return of invalids; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to place upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States all such persons returned by the District Judges of the several districts, under the act of Congress of the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, as shall appear, by the evidence accompanying such returns, and such documents as may be in the Office of the War Department, to come clearly within the act aforesaid, and are reported by the Secretary of War as having evidence competent; and in case of commissioned officers, contained in the said returns, who may, under this resolve, be placed upon the pension list at a sum less than full pensions, that the same rule respecting a return of commutation be adopted with them as is provided by an act of Congress in favor of Captain David Cook, of December sixteenth, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; and that all persons contained in the said returns, whose evidence is not complete, be returned by the Secretary of War to the District Judges, respectively, who reported them, by name, stating the particular reasons why their evidence is not complete, and, in each case, name the person whose evidence of leave-service is not lodged in his office; and the District Judges, respectively, shall forthwith notify, in every part of their districts, the persons named, and the reasons why their evidence is not complete, that they may have an opportunity to complete the same.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. TEACY, Mr. TREDWELL, Mr. BEATTY, and Mr. THATCHER, do prepare and bring in the same.

SUNDEY BILLS.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the President of the UNITED STATES to receive cessions of land for the site of light-houses and beacons, under certain limitations; which was read twice and committed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to increase the Military Force of the United States, and to encourage the recruiting service," to which they desire the concurrence of the House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for extending the benefit of a drawback, and terms of credit, in certain cases, and for other purposes," and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered. That the said bill do lie on the table. House be discharged from proceeding on so much of the report of the committee to whom was referred a Report of the Secretary of War on sixty petitions as relates to the petition of John Robbe. Resolved. That the said John Robbe be placed on the list of pensioners, pursuant to the Report of the Secretary of War; and that Mr. JESSEMAN SMITH, Mr. CORT, and Mr. MALBOSSE, do prepare and bring in a bill for that purpose.

FRIDAY, MAY 30.

An engrossed bill, authorizing the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to lay, regulate, and revoke embargoes, was read the third time, and passed.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to increase the Military Force of the United States, and to encourage the recruiting service," was read the first time.

Mr. SMILIE objected that there must be some other purpose for these troops than any that had been acknowledged; for he could see none. The principle of the bill was wrong.

Mr. GILES said, that the bill ought to be named "A bill authorizing the PRESIDENT to pass a law for raising ten thousand men." In point of principle, it was infinitely worse than the former one which the House had already rejected, (the one supported by Mr. SEDGWICK.) He hoped that they would not suffer it to go to a second reading. We had made estimates of the expenses of this year, and have been told that the ways and means are not sufficient. Yet, in the face of this, to come upon us all at once with the expense of a standing army of ten thousand men was too hard. He trusted that gentlemen who would vote for a second reading would explain the reasons that could induce them to such a measure. The time spent upon such a bill would be perfectly cast away. He was at a loss to discover against whom these ten thousand men were to be employed.

Mr. HILLHOUSE could not, at this moment, decide whether he ought to vote for this bill or not. He would recommend a Committee of the Whole to examine its merits. He should think it ungenerous for any gentleman in that House to call for his vote till it had been fully discussed.

Mr. FIRSTWORM.—If we were to debate for a week upon it, I am sure that there cannot be one new idea started. The whole argument lies in so narrow a compass that every member may decide on a first hearing. The question is, whether, on account of the particular state of the country at this time, it is proper to intrust the PRESIDENT with a discretionary power of raising an Army of ten thousand men? For my own part, I am as ready to decide just now as I ever can be.

Mr. AYES.—If we are to go to war, will it not be a prodigious saving of expense to have all matters ready beforehand? By being prepared two months before the war breaks out, the advantages in economy would be immense, as the price of enlisting men would rise four-fold when it was once known that war was certain. He knew many weak parts in the Union that might be attacked and in danger before a body of militia could be ready for effectual service. He was not qualified for details of this sort; but he knew that Rhode Island, for example, might be taken, and, in a short time, so strongly fortified, that it would be difficult or impossible to retake it. Why were we afraid to intrust the PRESIDENT with the power of raising ten thousand men? Can any body of men to be raised in this country tread down the substantial yeomanry? This is quite an Utopian dream. It is infinitely cheaper to raise and employ an Army at leisure, when the storm is seen to be approaching, than all at once, when twenty things must be done at the same time. There is, besides, a material distinction between this bill and the former. The force may be discontinued whenever the Legislature thinks proper; nor is it to be raised at all unless the PRESIDENT sees or thinks it necessary. The principle of the bill is, therefore, much less exceptionable than that of the other. To reject a bill on the first reading is a bad practice. Mr. A. hoped that the House would guard against it, unless where any thing was grossly improper, and depended on a single principle. But he trusted that the House would, in every common case, set their faces against it.

Mr. SMILIE contorted every thing said by Mr. AYES. He thought that the measure would involve this country in a very useless expense. Did we intend to rival the Military Establishments in Europe? The British might be expected to increase their forces in Canada in proportion to those of the United States.

Mr. DAYTON followed Mr. SMILIE, and said, that the arguments of the member who spoke last although intended to make a different impression, had convinced him of the impropriety of rejecting this bill upon its first reading. That gentleman had thought proper to enter into the intrinsic merits at this stage of it, when those who favored its principles could have no opportunity of defending or amending the particular parts of it. He had heard the objects of it grossly misrepresented. It had been asserted that the bill contemplated the increase of our Military Peace Establishment to sixteen thousand men.

(Mr. SMILIE interrupted Mr. DAYTON by declaring that he had never said or meant any such thing. But the defence of the Western Territory was to require six thousand men; and these, with the ten thousand to be raised by this bill, would amount, in the whole, to sixteen thousand men.)

No such thing (said Mr. D.) was to be found in it, and he called upon gentlemen to show upon what such an assertion was founded. He, for one, was of opinion that the interests and safety of the United States might be materially promoted by our vesting the PRESIDENT with the power to raise these men, if war should break out in the recess of Congress. Who did not believe that such an event was not only possible, but in some degree probable? Who would say, that if war should be forced upon us, this would not be considered as a most valuable provision, because we might have this respectable body of troops engaged, equipped, and prepared to act the moment that hostilities should be declared by the constituted authority? He would address himself to the feelings and interests of the member who spoke last, and those similarly circumstanced. They resided in the interior parts of the country, and hence it was that they did not seem to experience such lively sensations at the approach of danger on the Eastern frontiers—the sea. What (he asked) was their situation, and what had they to fear in case of an open rupture with Great Britain? It was easy to foresee that they would be vigorously pressed, not only by those Indians which are at present hostile, and by the regular troops in that quarter, but by all the neighboring nations of savages over whom British threats or bribes could have influence. A part of the Six Nations, too, would probably join the confederacy, and the frontier settlers of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New York, would certainly be driven in. With such a corps as the one proposed, an early check might be given to their interruptions, and the war be carried to their towns.

On the other hand, what would be the consequence, if, after the PRESIDENT perceives a war inevitable, he is not permitted to make the smallest preparation until he can convene Congress? Two months must be lost in convening them, owing to the extreme distances of their residence, all which time would be employed by our enemies in increasing their forces, in strengthening their posts, and establishing new ones, and in invading our country. Let this discretionary power be given to the PRESIDENT, (with whom much greater had repeatedly been lodged, and had never in any instance been improperly exercised,) and the men might be engaged while the members were collecting, and a small army in readiness to act as Congress should by law direct and authorize. No danger could arise from it, because the enlistments of those who might be engaged would be void unless the Legislature immediately upon their meeting, should confirm them. It had been said, that our reliance should be upon the militia. He had, Mr. D. said, as high an opinion of militia as any member in that House, for he had witnessed their exertions and importance in the late war, but could it be said that it would be very convenient or agreeable to them, to be drawn a distance from their own homes, to be employed in taking and garrisoning posts, if it should be deemed advisable to direct operations of that kind? He concluded with wishing that the bill might be allowed to have a second reading, as constructions had been imputed to it which it certainly would not bear.

Mr. MADISON did not accede to the principle of the bill. He did not see any such immediate prospect of a war, as could induce the House to violate the Constitution. He thought that it was a wise principle in the Constitution, to make one branch of Government raise an army, and another conduct it. If the Legislature had the power to conduct an army, they might embody it for that end. On the other hand, if the PRESIDENT was empowered to raise an army, as he is to direct its motions when raised, he might wish to assemble it for the sake of the influence to be acquired by the command. The Constitution had wisely guarded against that danger on either side. He could not, in the present case, consent to the breaking down of this barrier of public safety. He saw no necessity for it; nor any violent probability, that this country will be speedily invaded by any force, to which the present Military Establishment cannot make an adequate resistance. Let us hear from the Minister whom we have just sent to Britain, before we take such abrupt and expensive measures. We shall certainly hear from him, at least, before we are invaded. Now, if we enter into a calculation of the time requisite for his arrival in Britain, for commencing his business, and for sending back an account of what kind of reception he has met with, we shall find that by this period, Congress will have met again; or at least the interval will be so small as to make it not worth while to embrace any measure of this kind. Upon the whole, he could not venture to give his consent for violating so salutary a principle of the Constitution, as that upon which this bill encroached.

Mr. SEDGWICK differed from Mr. MADISON. He did not think that, in certain contingencies, war was so distant a prospect. Since is going to erect a fort in our Territories, and the PRESIDENT has declared that he will repel the attempt. We all know the waste of time and property in the last war, at its commencement, by trying to do the business with militia. The proposal met his approbation, as did the resolution of the PRESIDENT, to repel force by force.

Mr. FINDLEY spoke against the bill. The question was then stated, to wit: "Shall the said bill be rejected?" and, after debate thereon, the question being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 50, nays 32, as follows:

Van Allen, Peter Van Gasbeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, and John Watts.

It was then moved that the Whole House go into a committee on the bill for licenses on selling wine, and distilled spirits. Mr. Goodhue was for, and Mr. Giles against the motion. On a division, forty-four gentlemen rose in favor of it. The House accordingly went into a Committee, Mr. PARKER in the Chair.

The Committee, after some discussion, rose, and reported the bill with amendments. The House went into the consideration of the report. After some time, the question was put, "Shall this bill be engrossed for a third reading?" Ayes 41, noes 38.

ADVANCE OF MONEY TO FRANCE.

Mr. PARKER then moved that the House take into consideration the bill for payment of a certain sum of money to the French Republic.

The House resolved itself into a Committee on this bill—Mr. PARKER in the Chair.

Several amendments were proposed, and several members spoke.

Mr. GILES knew that Mr. Fauchet was anxious for this money, and spoke of it as necessary for his operations. He did not know whether to-day, to-morrow, or at what time in particular; but in fact the money was needed. He had another remark to make. This loan of three millions of florins had come upon all parts of the House alike, unexpectedly. Before it was known, we heard of no particular complaints from the Treasury, for want of money to raise the fortifications. But now, when the loan was come, the tone was altered, and there was a loud cry of emptiness in the Treasury.

Mr. GILLOX said, that gentlemen talked of giving this money, as if we were doing a favor to France. Is this so? We are sending a new Ambassador to that country. A very pretty introduction he would have at Paris, with our credentials in one hand, and a refusal to pay the debts due to the Republic in the other. We have been in need of her assistance before, and we may want it again.

The Committee made some amendments. The Chairman reported them, and the bill finally passed the House.

SUNDY BILLS.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to impose a duty of one cent per ton on all vessels from a foreign voyage into the port of Baltimore; and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. ARMSTRONG, and Mr. HUNTER, be the said committee.

The House next went into a Committee, Mr. PARKER in the Chair, on the bill for laying a duty on property sold at auction. The whole bill was strongly opposed by Mr. RUTHERFORD.

The Committee reported some amendments, which were agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of John Robbe; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. W. SMITH laid on the table a motion that a committee be appointed to inquire and report whether the sums appropriated for the fortifications of the ports and harbors of the United States be competent for that effect.

The resolution was immediately taken up, and negatived; and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, May 31.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to extend the credit for duties on teas imported in the ship Argonaut, and to permit the export of goods saved out of the wreck of the snow Freeborn; which was read twice and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

An engrossed bill, laying duties on licenses for selling wines and distilled spirituous liquors, by retail, was read the third time; and on the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 53, noes 23, as follows:

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Vice President being absent, the Senate have proceeded to the choice of the President pro tempore, and RALPH LEARD has been duly elected.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill entitled "An act making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas;" and, the same being read, some were agreed to and others disagreed to.

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Senate on the subject-matter of the amendments disagreed to; and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. PARKER, and Mr. SEDGWICK, be appointed managers at the said conference on the part of this House.

Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to provide for a health officer for the town of Baltimore; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of James Vanuxem, made a report: Whereupon,

Resolved, That the Collector of the District of Pennsylvania, be authorized to receive from James Vanuxem, consignee of the cargo of the ship Argonaut, bonds, with sufficient surety, for the amount of the duties on the teas imported in the said ship, payable on the — day of May, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, or to receive such of the said teas as may be now on hand, to secure the payment aforesaid, at the option of the said James Vanuxem.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. FOSTER, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill concerning invalids; which was read twice and committed.

Mr. TRACY, from the same committee, also reported a resolution in the form of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses, concerning invalids; which was read, and ordered to be committed to the committee last appointed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of James and Shoemaker: Whereupon,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to entitle the said James and Shoemaker to draw back the duties paid on the goods mentioned in the said petition, in case of their exportation.

Ordered, That Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODHUE, and Mr. FOSTER, be a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Governor of Maryland, enclosing a return of the election of GABRIEL DUVALL, to serve as one of the members of this House for the said State, in the room of John Francis Mercer, who has resigned his seat; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate insist on their amendments dis-greed to by this House to the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas;" and agree to the conference desired by this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments, to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES.

Mr. FITZSIMONS moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee on the bill for additions to an act for the punishment of certain crimes in the United States. He spoke a few words in explanation and support of the bill.

Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. GILES, and Mr. MADISON, spoke against it. Mr. SEDGWICK and Mr. MURRAY defended the bill. The former gentleman recommended a delay of the bill, as it was too late in the session to discuss a subject of such magnitude.

Mr. AMES rose after Mr. MADISON. He said that to postpone the bill was to reject it. It was saying we shall do nothing till next December to provide against events that will happen in the course of next Summer. He thought that the rejection of this bill might be attended with dangerous consequences. Had we forgotten the disastrous annals of the last year, and those decisions the black records of our dishonor? Juries would be afraid to give verdicts in these cases, when there seemed to be a doubt in the Legislature, which might be inferred from the rejection of this bill. Juries, such as we find them in America, (and Mr. A. said that he believed no other country had them half as good) are not equal to the task of determining points in the Law of Nations. Every question of this kind was of itself much more intricate than another in the municipal law. Nor will juries find, or think themselves safe in such cases to determine. There was another difficulty: the general authority of the United States was so limited, that it might be, perhaps, no easy matter to put a sentence in execution. We had been told from the first authority—that of the President—an authority which in no Government but ours would be called in question—that such additional powers were necessary. But if, after this notice, we reject the bill, this must damp the exertions of the Executive; and what if we shall be driven into a war by the licentious behaviour of some individuals? We are going to throw out this bill, though a great part of it is confessedly good. Mr. A. likewise adverted to the scheme of casting out bills at the first reading. This gave them a great and unfair disadvantage. The theory was bad, and the practice was a commentary, that made it appear still worse.

Mr. BALDWIN saw no harm in letting the bill lie by till next session. It had been laid aside for six months past; and why might it not be so for six months hence? There was no more danger in time to come than there had been already. There was not now time to do justice to a bill of such magnitude and importance. It ought not to be crowded into the tail of a session.

Robert Rutherford, John Smilie, Israel Smith, Thomas Tredwell, and Francis Walker.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Monday, June 2.

An engrossed bill to extend the credit for teas imported in the ship Argonaut, and to permit the export of goods saved out of the wreck of the snow Frelove, was read the third time and passed.

The bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for extending the benefit of a drawback and term of credit in certain cases, and for other purposes," was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from Francis Joachim Van Aken, styling himself Assistant Judge, addressed to the Congress of the United States, and dated Orebro, in Sweden, the first of January, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, stating the particulars of his discovery of an art, described in the Swedish language, for extinguishing fires, and preventing conflagrations, whether in war or peace, on board of vessels, or in houses on fire; which was read, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for information.

The following Message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and

of the House of Representatives:

I send you certain communications, recently received from Georgia, which materially change the prospect of affairs in that quarter, and seem to render a war with the Creek Nations more probable than it has been at any antecedent period. While the attention of Congress will be directed to the consideration of measures suited to the exigency, it cannot escape their observation that this intelligence brings a fresh proof of the insufficiency of the existing provisions of the laws towards the effectual cultivation and preservation of peace with our Indian neighbors.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, June 2, 1794.

The said Message was read, and, together with the communications therein referred to, ordered to lie on the table.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES.

Mr. GOODRUE then moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for additions to an act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States; which was agreed to.

The first section was then read, and Mr. NICHOLAS moved that it should be struck out. The words are as follows:

"If any person shall, within the territories or jurisdiction of the United States, except or take a commission to serve a Foreign Prince or State, in war, by land or sea, the person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not less than ——— dollars, nor more than ———; and shall be imprisoned not exceeding ——— nor less than ———."

The motion was carried by a majority of one; yeas 89, nays 38.

Mr. NICHOLAS then moved to strike out a part of the second section, which punishes a man for enlisting in a foreign service, or for going out of the limits of the United States to enlist in foreign service; and he proposed an amendment instead of it. His interpretation of the section, as it stood, was contested by Mr. KITTERA, who thought that the seduction of citizens to enlist, was the only thing meant.

Mr. SEDGWICK was of opinion that the amendment of Mr. NICHOLAS would authorize officers to raise armies in the United States for foreign service. He did not think that any man in that House would wish to do so. He was extremely disappointed at hearing the gentleman speak thus.

Mr. BORDWICK thought that members should endeavor to make an amendment in which they could be unanimous. He mentioned several reasons for thinking that this might be done.

Mr. NICHOLAS hoped that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEDGWICK] would always be disappointed in his [Mr. N.'s] sentiments; as they were almost always contradictory to those of the gentleman himself. He denied the inference.

Mr. HILLHOUSE imagined that it would be the highest disgrace to the United States, to suffer any man to enlist people here for foreign service. It might bring this country into a war. There were turbulent people in every country, who want a war; and we may be involved in it, undesignedly.

Mr. BOURNE thought that there was an inconsistency in the proposal before the House. If it was innocent for a person to enlist in foreign service, it was likewise innocent to persuade men to do it.

Mr. MURRAY had never heard any arguments like some of those which this day fell from Mr. NICHOLAS. Mr. M. was clear for putting a stop to all recruiting parties for foreign service. Wars to people only meeting to form the very first elements of a civil compact, they would have a right to say to each member of their society, that he should not enlist in any foreign service, to invade a nation perhaps friendly to them, without their consent. To countenance recruiting for foreign service, was admitting into the heart of the country an engagement against the sovereignty of the country. You invite every species of corruption. You invite foreign sovereigns to corrupt your citizens, and to subvert, if they desire it, the independence and the liberties of America. You put it in the power of an ambitious Prince or State in Europe to erect a body of men in the country for the purpose of overturning the Constitution. Something had been said about the principles of the Law of Nations; our own experience of last Summer and of last Autumn, showed that our Courts of Justice were incapable of enforcing them. He was against the resolution.

Mr. CLARK said that he was also against the motion of the gentleman from Virginia. Let officers go abroad, and learn the art of war; but let no foreign officers come here to enlist common soldiers.

The amendment of Mr. NICHOLAS was rejected without a division.

A motion was next made for striking out the fourth section; but this was negatived. It was next moved to strike out the sixth section, which stood as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to sell, within the United States, any vessel or goods captured from a Prince or State with whom the United States are at peace, which vessel or goods shall have been captured by any other foreign Prince or State; or by the subjects or citizens of such Prince or State; unless such vessel and goods shall have been first carried into a port or place within the territory of the Prince or State to which the captors belong, out such vessel and goods shall be carried out of the United States by those who shall have brought them in; and the sale of any vessel or goods, prohibited as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

Mr. Sumner, of South Carolina, said this question ought to be considered under two points of view: first, as to the right of France derived from the treaty; second, as to the expediency of admitting the practice, independently of any existing right. As to the right. This must result either from the clear words of the treaty, or from such strong implication as cannot be resisted. It is evident that the right of France to sell prizes in our ports is not given by the terms of the treaty. The only articles from which it can be pretended to be derived are the 17th and 23d. The 17th article is in these words:

"It shall be lawful for the ships of war of either party, and privateers, freely to carry wheresoever they please, the ships and goods taken from their enemies, &c., they may hoist sail at any time, and depart and carry their prizes to the places expressed in their commissions, which the commanders of such ships of war shall be obliged to show," &c.

The true construction of this article is the very reverse of the right contended for; it is a permission to conduct, wheresoever they please, the ships and goods taken from the enemy, without paying any duty. It is evident that it does not contemplate a freedom to sell their prizes in our ports, but, on the contrary, a departure to some other place, always to be expressed in their commission, where their validity is to be finally adjudged. And this construction is given to the article by Mr. Jefferson, the Secretary of State, in his correspondence with Mr. Morris, our Minister in France; with Mr. Genet, pages 68, 67, where he says, "the article does not give the right to sell at all," and again, "the admission to sell here the prizes made by France on her enemies is unstipulated in our treaties and unfounded in her own practice, or in that of other nations, as we believe." No right can be deduced from the 23d article but by construction and implication: the terms of that are:

"It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers, &c. to fit their ships, &c., to sell what they have taken, or in any other manner whatsoever to exchange their ships, merchandise, or any other loading," &c.

From this negative stipulation as to the enemies of France, an affirmative right is attempted to be inferred in favor of France herself; but the inference is a false one. Here I again recur to the authority of the former Secretary of State, whose reasoning with respect to the right of fitting out privateers, applies to this case, the right to sell prizes under this article standing precisely on the same footing as the right to fit out privateers. In page 60 of the printed Correspondence, Mr. Jefferson says, after quoting the words of the article, "translate this from the general terms in which it here stands into the special case produced by the present war," privateers not belonging to France or the United States, and having commissions from the enemies of one of them, "are, in the present state of things, British, Dutch, and Spanish privateers;" substituting these then for the equivalent term, it will stand thus, "it shall not be lawful for British, Dutch or Spanish privateers to fit their ships in the ports of the United States." Is this an express permission to France to do it? Does the negative to the enemies of France and silence as to France herself, imply an affirmative to France? Certainly not; it leaves the question, as to France, open and free to be decided according to circumstances, and if the parties had meant an affirmative stipulation, they would have provided for it expressly; they would never have left so important a point to be inferred from mere silence or implication. Suppose they had desired to stipulate a refusal to their enemies, but nothing to themselves, what form of expression would they have used? Certainly the one they have used, an express stipulation as to their enemies, and silence as to themselves. And such an intention corresponds not only with the words, but the circumstances of the times. It was of value to each party to exclude its enemies from arming in the ports of the other, and could in no case embarrass them. They, therefore, stipulated so far mutually; but each might be embarrassed by permitting the other to arm in its ports; they therefore would not stipulate to permit that. This reasoning proves so conclusively the non-existence of the right to fit out privateers in our ports, that the French Government withdrew their claim, and instructed their new Minister to express their approbation of the steps pursued by our Executive, and ordered him to recall all the commissions of privateers illegally fitted out. Now there is not an argument against the right to fit out privateers which does not apply with equal force against that of selling prizes; the same words are used in the article for both cases, and no inference can be drawn in favor of one which may not equally be drawn in favor of the other. The right to fit out privateers having been altogether abandoned by France, it would be not a little surprising that the right to sell prizes should now find advocates in our Councils.

Admitting that, by a forced construction of either of the two above mentioned articles of the treaty, an implication might arise favorable to the right, yet if the stepping beyond the line of strict obligation in favor of one belligerent Power, be deemed a departure from the line of neutrality, it may well be asked, shall we hazard the blessings of peace, and subject ourselves to the calamities of war, by inference, implication, or construction?

But let it be conceded, that either or both the articles import in the clearest manner the right contended for, I am ready to prove that the treaty quoad that grant, would be void and of no effect.

The treaty between France and the United States was founded on principles of perfect reciprocity; we are not bound by stipulation, which was intended to be mutual, if France was not equally bound by it; but France, at the time of entering into this treaty, was restrained by antecedent and existing treaties from granting to the United States the right of selling their prizes in the ports of France; the United States would therefore be absolved from the stipulation, supposing it to exist.

These several points can be clearly established. The preamble to the treaty in question has these strong expressions:

"His Most Christian Majesty and the United States have judged that the said end could not be better obtained than by taking for the basis of their agreement, the most perfect equality and reciprocity, and by carefully avoiding all these burdensome preferences which are usually sources of debate, embarrassment, and discontent, by leaving also each party to make, respecting commerce and navigation, those interior regulations which it shall find most convenient to itself, and by founding the advantages of commerce solely upon reciprocal utility."

It is laid down by Vattel, page 302, that—

"A Sovereign already bound by a treaty cannot make others contrary to the first; the things about which he has entered into engagements are no longer at his disposal; if it happens that a posterior treaty is found, in some point, to contradict one that is more ancient, the new treaty is null with respect to that point, as disposing of a thing that is no longer in the power of him who appears to dispose of it."

The treaty of Utrecht, between France and England, in the year 1713, stipulated in the 15th article, that—

"It shall not be lawful for any privateers, &c., who have commissions from any Prince or State, in enmity with either nation, to fit their ships in the ports of one or the other of the aforesaid parties, to sell what they had taken," &c.

In the event then of a war between the United States and Great Britain, France being neutral, we should have been restrained, by the treaty of Utrecht, from selling our prizes in the ports of France: the reciprocity, which is the basis of the treaty, is done away, and we are now called upon for a performance on our part of a mutual stipulation from which the other contracting Power is by treaty and the Law of Nations absolved.

If it be said that the treaty of Utrecht was, on account of intervening wars, not in force at the time our treaty with France was entered into, I will remark in reply, that the treaty of Utrecht was recognized by France, and revived by the treaty of Paris in 1763, and that it is an acknowledged maxim of the Law of Nations that the revival at a peace of a treaty which had been suspended by a state of war, restores the contracting parties to the same rights as if the treaty had never been suspended. Moreover, in the treaty of Paris of 1763, it is said—

"That the treaty of Utrecht shall serve as a basis to that treaty, and is renewed and confirmed in the best form, as if it were there inserted word for word, so that it is to be exactly observed in future, &c., and the said parties declare that they will not suffer any privilege, favor, or indulgence, to subsist, contrary to the above treaty," &c.

But what is still more conclusive, the very treaty between France and the United States refers to the treaty of Utrecht as being in full force at that time; in the 10th article, the United States are restrained from disturbing the right of fishery, belonging to France, "on that part of the coast of Newfoundland which is designated by the treaty of Utrecht, as the rights relative to all and each of the isles which belong to His Most Christian Majesty, the whole conformable to the true sense of the treaties of Utrecht and Paris." France was at peace with England in February, 1778, when our treaty was made; the treaty of Utrecht was consequently at that time in full force. But France was likewise restrained from granting us this right by the terms of the family compact with Spain, which was unquestionably in full force at the time of our treaty.

The remarks of Mr. Jefferson on the subject of fitting out privateers, are so applicable and pointed that I shall again quote him: page 60, he says—

"Let us go back to the state of things in France when this treaty was made, and we shall find several cases, wherein France could not have permitted us to arm in her ports, (he might have added, or sell our prizes.) Suppose a war between these States and Spain. We know that by the treaties between France and Spain, the former could not permit the enemies of the latter to arm in her ports. It was honest in her, therefore, not to deceive us by such a stipulation. Suppose a war between these States and Great Britain. By the treaties between France and Great Britain, in force at the signature of ours, we could not have been permitted to arm in the ports of France. She could not then have meant in this article to give us such a right. She has manifested the same sense of it again, in her subsequent treaty with England, made eight years after the date of ours, stipulating in the 16th article of it as in our 22d, that foreign privateers, not being subjects of either Crown, should not arm against either in the ports of the other. If this had amounted to an affirmative stipulation, that the subjects of the other Crown might arm in her ports against us, it would have been in direct contradiction to her twenty-second article with us. So that, to give to these negative stipulations an affirmative effect, is to render them inconsistent with each other, and with good faith; to give them only their negative and natural effect is to reconcile them to one another, and to good faith, and is clearly to adopt the sense in which France herself has expounded them. We may justly conclude, then, that the article only obliges us to refuse this right in the present case, to Great Britain and the other enemies of France; it does not go on to give it to France, either expressly, or by implication; we may then refuse it."

The treaty of Paris, in 1763, and the Treaty of Commerce, in 1786, both of which confirmed the Treaty of Utrecht, stipulated that the enemies of the two Powers, viz: France and Great Britain, should not be allowed to sell their prizes in the ports of either party. Were there any doubt remaining on this head, the practice of France herself would remove it. Her edicts, forbidding the sale of prizes in her ports, while in a state of neutrality, by any belligerent Power, and directing her vessels of war to carry their prizes into the ports of France, where they were fitted out, would sufficiently evince her construction of these Treaties. (See Vattel's Commentaries on the Marine Ordinances of France, pages 272, 277.)

An argument has been attempted, in another place, to be deduced from the Convention with the Dutch relative to the sale of prizes, and from the second article of our Treaty with France, which secures to her the privileges of the most favored nation. To this, several answers may be given—

1st. The Convention with the Dutch was a special Convention, relating to a special case, viz: to the then existing war in which both Holland and the United States were engaged as co-parties. None of the provisions of that Convention can relate to a case where the United States are at peace. The circumstance of that Convention being a separate instrument from the Treaty of Commerce, though dated on the same day, explains that it was intended for a special and temporary object, and not, like the Treaty of Commerce, meant to be a permanent compact. The preamble recites that it is intended to establish some uniform principles with relation to prizes made by vessels of war upon their common enemies.

2d. The fifth article of that Convention stipulates that the prizes of either party may be sold in their respective ports, as far as may be consistent with the twenty-second article of the Treaty of Commerce; which article, however, provides, that the Treaty with Holland shall not in any manner derogate from the twenty-second article of the Treaty with France. Now, by that article in the French Treaty, the Dutch are expressly prohibited from selling their prizes in our ports. If Holland, then, does not now possess the right, how can France derive it through Holland?

3d. The second article of our Treaty with France only stipulates that each party shall enjoy all the privileges of the most favored nation, on allowing the same compensation, if the concession was conditional; but France, as has been shown, cannot, consistently with good faith and an adherence to her Treaties, grant us the same compensation in similar circumstances. She would, therefore, not be entitled to this privilege granted to Holland on terms of reciprocity, supposing the privilege still to exist.

It remains to consider this important question on the ground of expediency. Abandoning the idea of right, is it expedient and politic to permit the sale of French prizes in the United States?

In contemplating this point, the determination ought not to be influenced by any prepossessions in favor of one or antipathies against another nation. The true ground of national policy should be taken, and the result should be that which is most consistent with our national interest. That the permission to France to sell her prizes in our ports would be advantageous to that nation, and inconvenient to her enemies, will not be denied. But it is the very circumstance of its thus being advantageous to one and inconvenient to others of the belligerent Powers which makes it inexpedient.

Were we prepared and resolved to become a party in the war, prompted either by gratitude for one, or resentment against another, of the Powers at war, it would be proper that we should at once take our side and pursue hostile steps; but, if the policy of the country still points to peace, and invites to neutrality, it follows, indispensably, that we must strictly adhere to the line of neutrality. There is no intermediate station between peace and war. Whatever may have been our sensibility in respect to injuries received, policy has for the present dictated to the Government of the United States a pacific system, and, as long as that system shall be the prevailing one, consistency requires an adherence to the principles it inculcates. The question, then, resolves itself into this: Is the voluntary permission to one of the belligerent Powers to sell her prizes in the ports of a neutral Power, while the same privilege is withheld from others, even our allies, a breach of neutrality? A recurrence to writers of authority, as well as the reason of the thing, will compel us to answer in the affirmative. Vattel, page 498, says:

"As long as a neutral nation wishes to enjoy this situation with certainty, it ought to show in every thing an exact impartiality between those who are at war; for, if it favors the one to the prejudice of the other, it cannot complain when that other shall treat it as an adherent and associate of the enemy. Its neutrality would be a fraudulent one, of which no one would be the dupe."

Mr. Jefferson, in the printed Correspondence, page 60, speaking of the fitting out of privateers, says: "Since we are bound by Treaty to refuse to the one party, and are free to refuse to the other, we are bound by the laws of neutrality to refuse it to that other."

In page 67, he says, that the permission to sell prizes in neutral ports is unfounded in the practice of France, and, he believes, of all other nations. It is certain that France has passed severe laws against it, and that, were we now at war with any European Power, and France neutral, we should not enjoy that privilege in her ports. The question is not confined to Great Britain and France, and it is not enough to say, "We have received injuries from the former and benefits from the latter, and, therefore, we should grant a special indulgence to one to the detriment of the other." Other nations are seriously affected by the decision. Spain, Holland, and Prussia, are co-parties in the war against France. (There is, indeed, an appearance of a withdrawing of the latter, though not yet ascertained.) We have no idea of going to war with the first. With the two last we have treaties of amity and commerce. It is not improbable, should the war continue, that Sweden may be implicated as one of the Combin'd Powers. With her we have also a Treaty of Amity and Commerce. A permission to France to sell her prizes will be a special privilege for her benefit, to the injury of Spain and Holland certainly, and probably Sweden. Should we feel no peculiar partiality for Spain, yet it ought not to be forgotten that she lent us money during our war with England, and combined with France to aid us. Gratitude should suggest a recollection of the services rendered us by Holland, and should forbid a departure from neutrality, which would essentially affect her interests. In our Treaty with Holland it is expressed, "that there shall be a firm, inviolable, and universal peace and sincere friendship between the two countries." Would it be a sincere friendship on our part to facilitate to their enemies the capture of their vessels by permitting the sale of them in our ports?

In regard to Great Britain, a negotiation is now depending for a redress of our wrongs. Whether or not there was sufficient cause of immediate war against that nation, or whether it was wise in the Government to prefer the path of negotiation to that of hostility, are questions not now to be discussed. The path of negotiation has been entered, and ought not to be deviated from till it has been fairly explored. Would a departure from the line of neutrality, as it relates to that nation, be, under the present circumstances, consistent with sound policy? Undoubtedly not. I would not furnish her with even this pretext for a refusal to do us justice. I would afford every aid, every chance for a successful negotiation. I would avoid throwing any impediments whatever in its way, and, having acted thus, should my expectations be disappointed, I shall feel myself justified in exposing my country to all the calamities of war, to endeavor to extort by force that which justice and moderation shall have failed to obtain.

There are other considerations arising out of the question of expediency which claim some notice. The sale of prizes in our ports will have an immediate tendency to increase the number of privateers on our coasts, to embarrass and distress our commerce, and to foster that spirit of privateering among our own citizens which, at the same time that it is a direct violation of neutrality, leads to the introduction of immoral habits. And here I cannot forbear once more quoting the former Secretary of State, who, in page 63 of the printed Correspondence, says:

"Were the merchant vessels coming for our produce forbidden to have any arms for their defence, every adventurer who has a boat, or money enough to buy one, would make her a privateer. Our coasts would swarm with them: foreign vessels must cease to come; our commerce must be suppressed; our produce remain on our hands, or at least that great portion of it which we have not vessels to carry away; our ploughs must be laid aside, and agriculture suspended. This is a sacrifice no Treaty could ever contemplate, and which we are not disposed to make out of mere complaisance to a false definition of the term privateer."

The pernicious consequences above described would equally flow from the allowance to sell prizes. From a view, therefore, of the whole subject, it clearly results that the sale of prizes is not stipulated by the Treaty; that, if it were, it would be null, as being repugnant to prior Treaties, and not reciprocal; that it is unfounded in the practice of France herself; and that it is inexpedient, as directly contravening the laws of neutrality, and as prejudicial to our commercial interests and the morals of our citizens.

Mr. MADISON said, he should not follow Mr. SMITH in the long argument which he had extracted chiefly from the Correspondence of Mr. Jefferson; because, were it admitted to be well-founded, it did not reach the true point to be decided. It was not merely a question, whether we were bound by treaty to permit the sale of French prizes. There was another question, whether we were bound, by the Law of Nations, and of neutrality, to refuse that permission? It had not been shown that we were bound to such refusal. A neutral nation might treat belligerent nations unequally, where it was in consequence of a stipulation prior to the war, and having no particular reference to it. It was laid down expressly, by all the best writers, that, to furnish a military force to one of the parties, in pursuance of such a stipulation, without a like aid to the other, was no breach of neutrality; and it amounted to the same thing whether the equilibrium were destroyed by putting an advantage in one scale, or taking a privilege from the other. The Executive had expounded the Law of Nations, and our treaties, in this sense, by leaving the sale of French prizes free, and forbidding the sale of British prizes. For the Legislature to decide that we were bound by the laws of neutrality to forbid the sale of French prizes also, would be to make themselves the expositors of the Law of Nations—to condemn the exposition of the Executive—to arm Britain with a charge against the United States, of having violated their neutrality; and, what ought particularly to be avoided, to arm her with claims of indemnification for injuries done her by the sale of prizes. Such a proceeding would be the more impolitic and extraordinary, as it could not fail to give extreme disgust to the French Republic, by withdrawing a privilege which it had been determined could be rightfully allowed her; and, as the British Minister, Lord Grenville, had admitted, in his conversation with Mr. Pinckney, that Britain had reason to be satisfied, on the whole, with the conduct of the United States as a neutral nation.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed, in answer to Mr. MADISON, that as the gentleman had given up the point of right, the ground was greatly narrowed, and rested altogether on expediency. The gentleman had contended that he (Mr. S.) had not shown that we were bound by the Law of Nations and of neutrality, to refuse the permission. Mr. S. said he was surprised at such an assertion, after he had quoted from Vattel and the late Secretary of State, the following passages, which he should again quote, as they had been so soon forgotten. Vattel, p. 489 says:

"As long as a neutral nation wishes to enjoy this situation with certainty, it ought to show in every thing an exact impartiality between those who are at war; for if it favors the one to the prejudice of the other, it cannot complain when that other shall treat it as an adherent and associate of the enemy; its neutrality would be a fraudulent one, of which no one would be the dupe."

Mr. Jefferson, page 60, speaking of the fitting out of privateers, which stands on the same footing as the selling of prizes, says:

"Since we are bound by treaty to refuse it to the one party, and are free to refuse it to the other, we are bound by the laws of neutrality to refuse it to that other."

The permission to sell prizes, certainly favors the one party to the prejudice of the other; it is only with that view that it is required; were it a matter of indifference, it would not be asked. Fattel, then, shows that it is contrary to the Law of Nations for a neutral nation to grant it; and Mr. Jefferson shows that it is contrary to the laws of neutrality.

But how does the gentleman prove that it is not contrary to the laws of neutrality? By proving that a neutral nation might treat belligerent nations unequally, where it was in consequence of a stipulation prior to the war, and having no particular reference to it. Mr. S. said, he subscribed to the truth of that doctrine, but it was the very reverse of the present case. How could a case of succor, stipulated prior to the war, and having no reference to it, apply to a case where it was admitted there was no stipulation prior to the war, and where the permission to sell would have reference to the existing war? The gentleman had mentioned the acquiescence of the Executive in the sale of prizes; but that proved nothing. At the commencement of the war between France and England, the agents of the former exercised the right of fitting out privateers, and of holding prize courts; as well might it be said, because a stop was not immediately put to this practice, that the Executive had acquiesced in it. The fact was, that these subjects being new and difficult, much time was required to regulate them. The President had applied to Congress for aid to enforce the laws of neutrality; the subject being properly before them, it was competent to them to prohibit every thing which, not being granted by treaty, it was contrary to the laws of neutrality to permit: this was, therefore, precisely the case where the Legislature ought to interpose to preserve the peace of the country. Instead of arming Britain with claims of indemnification for injuries done her by the sale of prizes already made, the sanctioning of the practice by striking out the clause, would furnish her with a pretext for indemnification for all prizes hereafter sold. France could not reasonably be dissatisfied, as the question had never been determined by the Executive; she had not been dissatisfied with the refusal to fit out privateers and hold courts; and yet she had as much right to complain in both those cases as in the present. The British Minister had specified the sale of prizes among the causes of complaint, as a deviation from neutrality; but had it been otherwise, it would not alter the propriety of the thing, for there were other parties interested besides England, and it was well known that Spain and Holland were dissatisfied.

Mr. HILLHOUSE spoke in favor of the clause. Mr. GOODHUE observed, that the subject lay within a very narrow compass. If, by our treaty with France, they had a right to sell their prizes in our ports, there was nothing more to be said. If they had no such right by treaty, then it was to be considered how far giving them this right would be a violation of our present neutrality. As to the treaty, Mr. Jefferson, our late Secretary of State, in his correspondence, communicated to us the present session, had explicitly said, that no such claims could be made by France, by virtue of our treaty with them, to such a measure. And, indeed, if we look into the treaty which France made with Great Britain in 1786, several years after the one they had formed with us, we shall have all doubts removed on the true construction which ought to be had upon the article mutually existing between us, by virtue of which such a right is pretended; for, in the treaty they made with Great Britain, they expressly stipulated that in case either party should be at war with any other nation, no prizes of the one being so at war shall be sold in the ports of the other; consequently, had it happened that we had been at war with Great Britain, and France had remained in peace, we could not, by the article in our treaty with them, have had such an indulgence. Indeed, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MADISON] seems to give up the right, and takes it up on the ground of expediency, and not having a tendency to violate our neutrality. Mr. Jefferson has also, in his correspondence, laid down this principle, that if a neutral nation granted a favor to one belligerent Power, which she withheld from the other, it was so far a violation of neutrality: this principle was incontrovertible. Mr. MADISON had said, we had not heard that the British Government had complained on this score to our Minister at London; but, though that was true, it was nevertheless true that their Minister here had made complaint of it to us; and Mr. G. was of opinion, that, in settling our accounts with Great Britain for the spoils they have committed on our commerce, they would bring as a charge against us, the prizes made of their vessels, which we had permitted the sale of in our ports. He therefore hoped the clause would not be stricken out, agreeably to the motion for that purpose. Mr. G. further observed, that it had given him much pain to see so many amendments proposed in the progress of this bill, to deprive the Executive and Judicial powers of this Government from being vested with that authority so essentially necessary to restrain the licentious from committing such acts as unquestionably hazarded the tranquility of our country.

Mr. NICHOLAS and Mr. TRACY also spoke, and Mr. MADISON rose in explanation.

For striking out the clause 46—against it 37.

After some further discussion, the Committee rose, and the Chairman reported the bill, with amendments.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments; whereupon amendments to the first, third, and fourth sections of the said bill being twice read, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The amendment to the sixth section of the said bill being twice read, to strike out the whole of the said section, in the words following:

"And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful to sell, within the United States, any vessel or goods captured from a Prince or State, or from the subjects or citizens of a Prince or State with which the United States are at peace, which vessel or goods shall have been captured by any other foreign Prince or State, or by the subjects or citizens of such Prince or State, unless such vessel and goods shall have been first carried into a port or place within the territory of the Prince or State to which the capture belong; but such vessel and goods shall be carried out of the United States by those who shall have brought them in. And the sale of any vessel or goods, prohibited as aforesaid, shall be utterly void."

On the question that the House do agree with the Committee of the Whole House in the said amendment, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 48, nays 38, as follows:

Van Allen, Peter Van Gasbeek, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, John Watts, and Joseph Winston.

The said bill, with the amendments, was then read the third time and passed.

TUESDAY, June 6.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from Arthur St. Clair, Governor of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, requesting a speedy decision on the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the expedition carried on against the Western Indians, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SCOTT moved that certain papers should be printed. On them had been founded the report of the committee, as to the failure of St. Clair's expedition.

Mr. CLARK thought that it would be better to send the whole papers up with the box that contained them to Washington county, which the member [Mr. SCOTT] came from, and if one or two persons there wanted to read them, they might do it in the manuscript.

Mr. DAYTON took the box which held the papers, and emptied it on the floor. They made up a number of large bundles.

Mr. SCOTT thought that it would be very easy to print them. It was observed, that before papers were ordered to be printed, it was a rule of the House to have them read. The reading would take at least a week, though the House were to do nothing else. The motion was negatived.

Resolved, That the resolution of the twenty-first ultimo, authorizing the President of the Senate and SPEAKER of the House of Representatives to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on this day, be repealed; and that, instead thereof, they be authorized to adjourn their respective Houses on Thursday, the fifth instant, to meet on that day by law appointed.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate recede from their amendments disagreed to by this House, and insisted on by the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for securing and collecting the duties on foreign and domestic distilled spirits, stills, wines, and teas," and do agree to the said amendments, with certain modifications of the same, agreeably to the report of the committee of conference. The House proceeded to consider the said message: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to all the modifications of the said amendments, as proposed by the committee of conference, except the amendment to the twelfth section; and that the Senate be informed that this House have, in their first proceeding on the amendments of the Senate, agreed to the amendment to the said twelfth section, as originally proposed by the Senate.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill concerning invalids; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read; and, on the question put thereupon, disagreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to report a state of facts, with their opinion thereon, relative to a settlement made by the State of North Carolina, for certain claims against the United States; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consider-tion, and made some progress therein. And on the question that the Committee of the Whole House have leave to sit again on the said report, it passed in the negative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to make further compensation for the services of the late Robert Forsyth, Marshal of Georgia; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day. It was so read and passed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill appropriating any moneys not already appropriated, and that Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. HILLHOUSE, be the said committee.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a general abstract of the exports of the United States for one year, ending on the thirtieth of September; one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; also, two summary statements, for the same period, exhibiting the value of the exports from each State, and a view of the exportation to all the foreign Dominions with whom the United States maintain a commercial intercourse; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled, "An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugars," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The House then proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

An engrossed bill to make further compensation for the services of the late Robert Forsyth, Marshal of Georgia, was read the third time, and on the question that the said bill do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 46, nays 26, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, Abraham Baldwin, John Beatty, Benjamin Bourne, Thomas P. Cames, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, William J. Dawson, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, Thomas Hartley, William Hindman, John Hunter, John Wilkes Kittera, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, William Lyman, Francis Malone, Peter Muhlenberg, William Vane Murray, Josiah Parker, Andrew Pickens, Robert Rutherford, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, John Smilie, Israel Smith, William Smith, Thomas Sprigg, Silas Talbot, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gausebeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and John Watts.

NAYS.—Thomas Blount, Elias Boudinot, Thomas Claiborne, Abraham Clark, Joshua Coit, Isaac Coles, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, James Gordon, George Hancock, James Hillhouse, Matthew Locke, Nathaniel Macon, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Joseph Neville, Nathaniel Niles, Francis Preton, Jeremiah Smith, Thomas Tredwell, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, Benjamin Williams, and Joseph Winston.

An engrossed bill concerning invalids was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also agreed to the resolution of the twenty-first ultimo, for the adjournment of the two Houses on this day, and authorizing the President of the Senate and the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on Thursday, the 5th instant.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and, the same being read, some were agreed to, and others disagreed to.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying an estimate of the sums which require to be appropriated, in addition to those provided for during the present session; also, a statement of the appropriation of ten thousand dollars for the purpose of defraying the contingent charges of Government; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed to bring in a bill, appropriating any moneys not already appropriated.

PURCHASE OF GALLEYS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, during the recess of the present Congress, to cause to be purchased or built a number of vessels, to be equipped as galleys in the service of the United States."

Mr. PARKER moved that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the farther consideration of the bill.

Mr. MURRAY objected to the motion. They would, in case of a war, be very useful.

Mr. LYMAN wondered that certain gentlemen, who had objected to every measure for avenging the injuries of America, were so forward in every measure that would lead this country into expense. He contended that there was no danger of a war. He had just received a letter from New York, stating that a vessel had just arrived from England, which brought intelligence down to the 17th of April. The combined armies were making off; and the country from which we have most reason to fear hostilities is internally in a state so alarming, that she is likely to have more need of galleys for her own protection than we have for ours.

Mr. HILLHOUSE observed, that he was one of those who came under the lash, as averse to avenging the injuries of America. He was, however, as independent as any member of that House; and was answerable only to his own conscience for his conduct. He wished that gentlemen would spare such reflections. In the present instance, the remark was unfortunate, because the bill did not meet with his approbation. He had no idea that there would be occasion for galleys or anything of the kind.

Mr. BALDWIN approved of the proposal for the galleys.

The House went into a Committee on this subject.—Mr. TRUMBULL in the Chair; the motion for discharging the Committee having been negatived—yeas 35, noes 37.

Mr. CLARK rose and moved that the first section of the bill should be struck out.

Mr. PARKER seconded the motion. He never knew of any good that galleys had done. They could not be made to stand an attack, even when, as at Mud fort, under the shelter of fortifications. As to himself, he would think his house more secure with no galleys at all, than if half a dozen were lying in the front of it. Instead of a defence, they often did mischief to the coast. Privateers, or ships of war, attacked them; and in the pursuit, landed and burnt the houses in the neighborhood. This was the sort of defence which they afforded. He would be glad to hear, what he had never yet been able to hear, viz. of any service of any kind that they had performed.

Mr. BALDWIN. The gentleman has got his frigates and fortifications. He should indulge other people with modes of defence that they are anxious for. If they are of no use in James' river, do not seek them. They will not be given to those who do not want them. There is no fear that the PRESIDENT will be too lavish of them. The Georgians were vastly the better for them in the time of the war.

Mr. FITZSIMONS affirmed, that they had been of very great service in the war. They were of much use in the Delaware. They stopped for some time the progress of the British army. He was informed of this by gentlemen whom he could trust as much as he could do any body in that House.

Mr. MADISON knew not what opinion to form between such opposite assertions. Personally, he was no judge. Only the bill could not pass in its present form, if it passed at all; because the number of galleys must be limited by the act.

Mr. SEDGWICK was against the galleys. He, like Mr. HILLHOUSE, was one of those gentlemen who came under the lash of Mr. LYMAN. He had voted against the measures referred to by that gentleman, but he was also against the present. Further, the gentleman was entirely mistaken as to the quarter from whence the bill came. It had been supported in the Senate by a description of persons whom the gentleman would, to-morrow, be calling his bosom friends. He reproached all reflections of this nature, and concluded by remarking, that "the gentleman's reputation should be unblemished, who calls that of other people in question."

Mr. WADSWORTH had been for twenty years at sea; so he should know something of the matter. He was for the galleys. If they went off at Mud fort, that was not any fault in them, but an impeachment of the conduct of those who conducted them. In some places they were very useful. A vessel of this kind might be constructed that would fight all the privateers of Bermuda. He thought that the inhabitants of North Carolina and Georgia should be indulged in their wishes. He named an officer in the later State, who, during the war, did more mischief to the British by galleys, than was done by all the battles fought by land in the country. At New London, where he lived, they were not worth a rush; but in many situations they might be very useful.

Mr. MURRAY likewise replied to the remarks of Mr. LYMAN. He came under the same description with the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEDGWICK.] He was for the galleys. He gave a description of the construction of the galleys and their immense conveniences in certain situations. On motion, the Committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, June 4.

An engrossed bill making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts, was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES to receive cessions of land for the sites of light-houses and beacons, under certain limitations; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

And on the question that the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time, it passed in the negative. And so the bill was rejected.

Resolved, That a joint committee of both Houses be appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and request that he would recommend to the People of the United States a day of public humiliation and prayer, to be observed by supplicating Almighty God for the safety, peace, and welfare of these States; and that Mr. BORDINOR, Mr. NILES, and Mr. GORDON, be of the said committee, on the part of this House.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the relief of Nicholas Rieb; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto; and read the third time to-day.

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing a settlement of certain expenses of the Commissioners of Loans;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The said bill was then read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act laying duties on licenses for selling wines and foreign distilled spirituous liquors by retail;" with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and the same being read, were agreed to.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I lay before Congress the copy of a Letter, with its enclosure, from the Secretary of State to the Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty, it being an answer to a Letter from the Minister to him, bearing date the 22d ultimo, and already communicated.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, June 4, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the foregoing message. Whereupon, leys had been taken by an American packet-boat, which was commanded by a gentleman who since had a seat in that House. He was for striking out the section. Gallies had been of no use to the British, and of none to America.

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate; and that Mr. GILES, Mr. LYMAN, and Mr. DAYTON, be appointed managers at the same on the part of this House.

Mr. GILES said, that he had nothing to do with them. As to personal reflections, he had nothing to do with them. They did not suit him.

Mr. PARKER said, that he had made the original motion for striking out the clause, and he adhered to his opinion. Ten or twelve gallies, during the war, had cost Virginia seven, eight, or ten hundred thousand dollars for no purpose. It was true, that gallies were not to be attacked; for they commonly got into such situations as to be out of the reach of any enemy except the mosquitoes. Brave men would fight as well in a galley as any where else; but no man of spirit would place himself in them. (Of this, there was melancholy experience in Virginia during the war. He considered the bill as nothing but a useless attack upon the Treasury. He was ready to vote for the building of twenty-gun ships. But he believed that the danger was over, and that the nation which had insulted us already would insult us no more.

Mr. GILLES wished to limit the number of the gallies. He had been very unwell, which had hindered him from attending to the bill. He hoped that the explanations of some gentlemen would be like what the lawyers call a bar dinner at the end of the term. They would promote a good understanding.

Mr. BALDWIN was in favor of the gallies.

Mr. MADISON wished to refer the clause to a special committee.

On a division as to the clause, there were for striking out—ayes 33, noes 40.

Mr. GILES moved an amendment, that the number of gallies should not exceed ten; which was agreed to.

After some further conversation, the Committee rose, and the Chairman reported the amendments. The House took them up, and ordered the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The said bill, with the amendments, was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it was resolved in the affirmative—ayes 42, noes 32, as follows:

NAYS.—Theodoras Bailey, Thomas Blount, Benjamin Bourne, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Joshua Cott, Isaac Coker, William J. Dawson, Henry

Dearborn, George Dent, William B. Giles, Nicholas Gilman, Daniel Heister, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, Alexander Mebane, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Joseph Neville, Anthony New, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Francis Preaton, Robert Rutherford, Thomas Scott, John Smilie, Jeremiah Smith, Israel Smith, Thomas Sprigg, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, and Joseph Winston.

THURSDAY, June 5.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to make further compensation for the services of the late Robert Forsyth, Marshal of Georgia," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said amendments, and, the same being read, were agreed to.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Nicholas Rieb was read the third time, and passed.

INVALID PENSIONERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the resolution reported by the committee to whom were referred two Reports of the Secretary of War, accompanying statements in the cases of claimants for invalid pensions; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said resolution under consideration, and made an amendment thereto; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

The said resolution, as amended, was again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary for the Department of War be, and he is hereby, directed to make out an exact list of the names of each person returned to him as invalid pensioners by the Judges of the Circuit Courts of the United States signing themselves as Commissioners, under the act of Congress passed the twenty-third of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, entitled "An act to provide for the settlement of the claims of widows and orphans, barred by the limitations heretofore established, and to regulate the claims to invalid pensions;" and to return to the Judge of each district one copy of such list, stating particularly the district from which each person was returned, and that all are, by Congress, directed not to be entered on the pension list. And the said Secretary is further directed to return to each District Judge a list of the names of all such persons as have been returned as invalid pensioners by the District Judges, under the act of Congress, passed the twenty-eighth of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, entitled "An act to regulate claims to invalid pensions," distinguishing those who have been placed on the pension list and those who have not been placed on the same, by reason of their testimony being incomplete, stating particularly the legal requisite or requisites wanting in the evidence of each, and naming such of them whose evidence of leaving the service is not lodged in his office. And the Judges of the several District Courts, upon receipt of the above-described lists and statements from the Secretary for the Department of War, are hereby directed forthwith to publish the same in every part of their respective districts, adding to such publication the time when the act regulating the claims to invalid pensions expires.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the remission of the duties on certain distilled spirits which have been destroyed by fire;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto. The said bill was then read the third time, and passed.

COMPENSATION TO CERTAIN CLERKS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act allowing an additional compensation to the Principal Clerks in the Department of State, and in the Treasury and War Departments, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four;" and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

And on the question that the said bill be now read the third time, it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 43, nays 32, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Theodorus Bailey, Benjamin Bowne, Gabriel Christie, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, William J. Dawson, Jonathan Dayton, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, James Gordon, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, Daniel Heister, William Hindman, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Joseph Neville, Andrew Pickens, Francis Preston, Robert Rutherford, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Peter Van Gaasbeck, Abraham Venable, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, John Watts, Benjamin Williams, and Richard Winn.

The said bill was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SUNDY BILLS.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to continue in force the "Act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light-houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers;" and that Mr. Boudinot,

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. GILES, from the managers appointed on the part of this House to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," made a report. Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth recede, in part, from their disagreement to the second amendment of the first section, and doth agree to the same, with an amendment, by striking out the words "one cent and a half," and inserting, in lieu thereof, "one-half a cent."

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to the last amendment to the first section.

Resolved, That this House doth recede from their disagreement to the amendment for striking out the fourth section of the said bill.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to continue in force the act, entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes;" and that Mr. Boudinot, Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, and Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

Mr. BODINOT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the "Act supplementary to the act for the establishment and support of light houses, beacons, buoys, and public piers;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day. The bill was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BODINOT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the act, entitled "An act to ascertain the fees in Admiralty proceedings in the District Courts of the United States, and for other purposes;" which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day. The bill was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to a resolution that the resolution of the third instant for the adjournment of the two Houses on this day be rescinded; and that the PRESIDENT of the Senate and SPEAKER of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session, by adjourning their respective Houses on Monday, the ninth instant, to meet again on the day by law appointed; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the said resolution, and, the same being read, was agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the remonstrance of the people west of the Alleghany Mountains, relative to the navigation of the river Mississippi; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That, as it appears from the communications of the Executive, that the right of the United States to the free navigation of the Mississippi is now the subject of negotiation with the Court of Spain; and, as it is the interest of the United States, and every part thereof, to come to an amicable adjustment of the right in that mode, rather than resort to any means Constitutionally belonging to the Legislature, no further proceedings should be had on the said remonstrance, during the present session of Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of War, communicating further information relative to recent events on the South-western frontiers of the United States; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom was referred the Letter from the Attorney General, of the twenty-first ultimo, accompanying a table of costs and fees for the Courts of the United States. Whereupon,

Resolved, That the table of fees reported by the Attorney General be referred back to him, with directions that he do report to this House, during the next session of Congress, such tables of fees, and regulations relative to the same, as, on a comparative view of the fees taxable in the several States, shall, in his opinion, be proper to be established for the Courts of the United States.

On motion.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the House of Representatives, at each annual session, within ten days after the commencement of the same, a distinct account of the revenues arising under the several duties and taxes, and of the expense attending the collection of each particular duty or tax, as far as such expense can be discriminated; and also of the number of officers employed in collecting the public revenue, and the allowances made to them, respectively.

FRIDAY, June 6.

It being suggested that a mistake had occurred in the enrolment of the bill entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" on motion,

Resolved, That the Committee of Enrolment be authorized to amend the enrolled bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels," by striking out the word "next," in the second line of the first section, and by inserting, instead thereof, the word "instant;" also, by making a corresponding alteration throughout the bill, and by striking out, in the title thereof, the words "and on the tonnage of ships or vessels;" that the engrossed bill be amended conformably thereto; and that the concurrence of the Senate be requested, by message, in this resolution.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House, authorizing the Committee of Enrolment to amend the enrolled bill, entitled "An act laying additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels."

The present Doorkeeper of the House having omitted to perform the duties of his office for some time past,

Resolved, That the House will now proceed to choose another Doorkeeper in his room, to commence his services from and after Monday next.

The House accordingly proceeded, by ballot, to the choice of a Doorkeeper; and, upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the Whole House was found in favor of Thomas Claxton.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to provide for a Health Officer for the town of Baltimore; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday by the Committee of the Whole House to the bill making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed; and the same, being amended at the Clerk's table, and, together with the amendments, ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Griffith Jones; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill authorizing the proper officers of the Treasury to settle the account of Griffith Jones, as not barred by the act of limitation.

Ordered, That Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. VAN ALLEN, Mr. CADWALLADER, and Mr. CHRISTIE, be a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

An engrossed bill to provide for a Health Officer for the town of Baltimore, was read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of Samuel Prioleau, which lay on the table : whereupon,

Resolved, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to settle the accounts of Samuel Prioleau, as not barred by the statute of limitation.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution ; and that Mr. FISKELEY, Mr. SWIFT, Mr. VAN ALLEN, Mr. CADWALADER, and Mr. CHRISTIE, do prepare and bring in the same.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act concerning invalids;" also, the bill entitled "An act laying duties on property sold at auction," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House: the Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. FISKELEY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the settlement of the claims of Griffith Jones and Samuel Prioleau; which was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed and read the third time to-day.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the reports of the committee to whom was referred the memorials of the Clerks in several of the Public Offices; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That Leighton Wood, Clement C. Brown, Joshua Dawson, Joseph Stretch, Charles Tomkins, William Shepherd, John Little, John Hindman, John Matthews, George Mitchell, John Thompson, Miles F. Clossey, Benjamin Bankson, Philip Audebert, Benjamin Betterton, and Joseph Parker, Clerks in the Public Offices, and the families of George Walker, Jacob S. Howell, Charles Wilson, Thomas O'Hara, and Matthew Walker, also Clerks in the Public Offices, and of James Davison, a Clerk in the Post Office, be allowed out of the Treasury of the United States, the sum of — dollars.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. TRACY, Mr. MONTGOMERY, and Mr. WILLIAMS, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act laying duties on property sold at auction;" and, the same being read, were agreed to.

An engrossed bill to authorize the settlement of the claims of Griffith Jones and Samuel Prioleau, against the United States, was read the third time and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to promote the progress of Useful Arts,'" and, the same being read, were agreed to.

REGISTRATION OF SEAMEN.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for registration and protection of American seamen.

Mr. FITZSIMONS was against the bill. It would be extremely unfavorable to the American navigation; because every man on board of our vessels, who has not a certificate, will, in future, if the law takes place, be considered as not an American. There are not one-tenth part of the sailors of the port of Philadelphia natives of the country. They are the fragments of all nations; but they do their business for the most part very well. He thought that the bill had much better be laid aside for the present. There was one difference between this country and Britain, that had never yet been settled. Britain insists upon considering as her own lawful subjects all persons born in that country, or its dependencies, who had not been in the American service at the time when the Declaration of Independence was made. This difficulty it had never yet been found practicable to remove.

Mr. MURRAY defended the bill. It was not his intention, when he moved the consideration of this subject, to promise a complete system in this desirable point—his wish was rather to secure the advantages which certainly were within our reach, than Quixotically to encounter or to dispute the claims of foreign nations on the point which the gentleman had alluded to—Britain rested her claims to allegiance on a feudal principle, that no subject could, by any act of his own, by any change of time, place, or of oath, free himself from his allegiance to his liege lord, as that natural allegiance is indissoluble. He contests this principle, so inconvenient to mankind, at present. As the extent of this operation is a point which cannot be settled by an act of this body, it must be determined by negotiation, and a convention stipulating the precincts of right on this important question. As to the argument, that those who shall not obtain these protections will, though really Americans, be liable to impressment, it would apply with equal force to any other period at which this subject should be taken up. The very nature of the subject precludes the uniform operation of a law of this sort. As to time and place, seamen are never all of them on shore—half are generally aboard, half on shore—it is not so with laws operating on land men, who are stationary, and can be uniformly acted on, at the same moment. Besides, this bill does not render it the duty of seamen to obtain evidence. If it did, the argument would apply, as it would then be concluded, that those who had not protections were not entitled to them. The bill only enjoins it as a duty on Collectors to do certain things on application. This objection is then not to the bill, but to the nature of the subject of it. Mr. M. stated the circumstances that took place during the Nootka Sound impressment, where so many Americans were ignominiously impressed. He hoped in a few years to see a strong line drawn between our seamen and those of all other nations, and he could not believe but that if our own seamen carried out such evidence of birth and of citizenship as the bill demanded, even the British, whose insolence had been so recently manifested, would pay as much respect to such evidence, when entered in the ships' papers, as they will to clearances or other papers certified under the authorities of the United States.

The general object of the bill was to protect seamen from foreign impressment, but some collateral benefits naturally were attendant on the main object. By beginning a registration of seamen, the country will in time derive the advantage of knowing the number of seafaring citizens, on whom she may rely in time of war—and the municipal rights of citizens will be rendered more secure in case of intestacy occurring among a body who are fond of change, whose names, births, and place of general residence, being identified before they leave the country, their heirs will have additional security. On this part of the bill, he would remark that nothing more than an outline of a larger system than could be completely organized was intended. In time, when practice shall have pointed the attention of seamen to this subject, a very good provision may be ingrafted to great advantage under the principle of registers, the obliging of captains to return a list of the seamen who may come home, with the cause of absence of such as may not return, all of whose names will have been previously registered. This was a few years since the practice in France, and was an attention to the seamen and their interest, which was worthy of imitation, as it secured their effects and wages to their legal representatives. This, however, could not be done till usage had familiarized both captains and sailors to a practice of registering, from motives of immediate personal protection, as is intended by this bill. The Collector of the district who gives clearances to vessels is obliged by the bill to keep this book, in which he is to enter the names, ages, places of birth, and of general residence, of all American seamen who may apply with well attested proof of the fact and circumstance of birth or of citizenship. After he has entered these things in his book, he is to make a short memorandum of this in each case in the clearance of the vessels, certifying that the memorandum is from authenticated evidence. He is then to give the seamen a certificate called a protection, which will likewise be a short memorandum from the evidence stated, attested by himself, and under seal, and then return to the seaman all his original papers. The original papers are to be returned that a seaman who has once obtained them may be enabled to have similar protection granted him at any port in the United States subsequently, if he should happen to embark at a distance from the place where he could most easily obtain evidence of the highest degree, that of parents or neighbors in early life. Thus, a seaman obtaining evidence in Baltimore, might, at Boston, on another voyage, be assisted, and receive a protection. He will, of course, feel a pride, as well as interest, in the safe-keeping of these papers. They will prove frequently the means of protection and aid to him in foreign countries, and operate by a ready association of interest and affection in his mind, as a badge of national glory, and an incentive to patriotism. We must, at least, trust to practice for protection in all provisions of this sort. We must suppose a wisdom in Government never fails to suggest. He well knew there were many difficulties in the way, yet he did not despair of partial success, though complete security were unattainable, as long as the rights of citizenship, adverse to the obligations of natural allegiance, as it is called in England, remained unsettled, or at least not recognized between this country and Great Britain by convention. If we do not now begin the system, it must be done some other time, and the objections he had heard would apply to any other period, so it was good policy to begin now if at all.

Mr. W. SWIFT objected to the bill, as at present impracticable. He moved that this Committee do now rise.

Mr. DAYTON seconded the motion. He was of opinion that we were, in this case, like a dwarf taking the standard height of a full grown man to measure himself by. All seamen of the United States, who wanted this certificate, would, in future, be seized, and it was certain that many would neglect to get it.

The Committee now rose, and the question being taken that the Committee of the Whole House have leave to sit again on the said bill. It passed in the negative.

Ordered, That the Committee to whom was committed the report of the Secretary of War on the memorial of Peter Peritt, be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that the said memorial be again referred to the Secretary of War, with instruction further to examine the same, and make report thereon at the next session.

SOUTHWESTERN FRONTIER.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers:" whereupon,

The first amendment, to strike out the first three sections of the said bill, being read at the Clerk's table, in the words following, viz :

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to call out, from time to time, as occasion may require, any number of militia, belonging to the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, or the Territory South of the river Ohio, not exceeding, in the whole, ten thousand, as may at any time be by him thought necessary to carry on offensive operations against the Creek and Cherokee nations or tribes of Indians: Provided, That the militia to be called out be not continued in service for a longer term than six months, at any one time.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to establish such military posts as he may deem necessary for the perma-ment security of the Southwestern frontier settlers; and that the posts, so to be established, shall be guarded by troops from the line of the present Military establishment, or by the militia from the States and Territory aforesaid, as the President may judge most expedient; and between every two of the said posts there shall be kept up a constant patrol of mounted rangers.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, the militia to be employed by virtue of this act shall, while in the service, be entitled to receive the same rations, pay, and clothing, or money in lieu thereof, as the troops now in the service of the United States are entitled to."

And, in lieu thereof, insert:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States shall be, and he hereby is, authorized to raise, for three years, unless sooner discharged, within the States of Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and the Territory South of the Ohio, and Virginia, an additional regiment of infantry, consisting of one thousand one hundred and forty non-commissioned officers and privates, and solely to appoint the commissioned officers thereto, and organize the same, according to the present Establishment: Provided, That, if the President of the United States shall be of opinion that any part of the legion now in service, whether officers or privates, can, without detriment to the public service, be transferred, and constitute a part of the regiment herein provided, he be authorized to make such transfer.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians, of the said regiment shall receive, as a bounty, the sum of twenty dollars, one half to be paid immediately after enlistment, the other half at the end of three months thereafter; and that they together with the commissioned officers, shall receive the same pay and allowances, in all respects, and be governed by the same rules and articles of war, as the other troops of the United States."

Mr. GILES expressed the utmost surprise at such a proposal. First, it had been projected to raise a standing army of fifteen thousand men, then twenty-five thousand, then ten thousand; and now, when all these schemes had been put to an end, this regiment of eleven hundred and forty men has appeared. Proteus never assumed a greater number of shapes than this attempt has done. His jealousy was highly excited by such a steady adherence to an idea so extremely offensive. The people of the United States did not wish to be trodden down by a Continental army. How this amendment might sit on the stomachs of some people, he could not say; but, if he were one of the gentlemen who represented the people, from whom the requisition for defence had come, the amendment of the Senate would sit very badly indeed upon his stomach.

Mr. NICHOLAS said, that a bill had been wanted to protect the frontiers, but, by this amendment, the bill would scourg them. He wondered at the pertinacity of some people, in adhering to the idea of a standing army. Mr. N. enlarged considerably on the question before the House.

Mr. McDOWELL had lived long on the frontiers, and he believed that he understood, from personal experience, what was the proper mode of defending them, as well as perhaps any gentleman on that floor. He was against the amendment, because he knew from repeated experiments, that regular troops were, in this kind of service, altogether useless. The militia of the frontiers, who knew the country, and whose habits of life made them perfectly acquainted with the character of the enemy whom they had to encounter, were the only proper forces to oppose the Indians, with success. But why Government should burden itself with an useless expense, or the people with a kind of defence which they disliked, Mr. McD. did not know. Perhaps there was no part of the Union that had behaved so prudently and so patriotically as the citizens on the Southwestern frontiers. Yet Indian treaties were constantly broken by the savages themselves. Gentlemen who had never been witnesses to the scene, did not feel it, with adequate comprehension or sensibility. A man went to his corn-field, along with his son, who was shot dead by his side. He came home, and found his wife and the rest of his family murdered. Circumstances of this kind, and of which Mr. McD. drew an affecting picture, were too dreadful for human patience to support.

Mr. BOURNOR thought that the militia could not be kept together for six months, and that it was better to have regular troops.

Mr. ANAS replied to Mr. GILES. It was wrong to say that this was part of a system, and that the twenty-five thousand men had been part of it. He saw no such thing. We have one Indian war already, which is enough at a time. Those whom we are now to quarrel with, are three times more numerous than those to the Northwest. The Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, and Chickasaws, were, as Mr. A. had been informed, fifteen thousand fighting men. He did not think that there were too many Indians on the frontier, any more than too many wild beasts. The one might, by skillful management, be rendered as harmless as the other. Even the success of an Indian war, by extending our frontier, augments the number of our enemies; so that the task is hopeless, and has no end. Distance from the Seat of Government would increase, and with it the charges of defence. He was not one of those who wished to exterminate these poor creatures. He recommended a system of restraint on both sides. He could wish for something as strong as the Chinese wall to separate them. When an exasperated militia went out, what were we to expect, but that the first man with a red skin whom they met would be shot? Presently you discover that you have been shooting an Indian of the wrong nation, while, in the mean time, this whole nation rises and attacks you. The Continental troops, as being less exasperated, were less apt to fall into mistakes of this kind. He did not wish the militia to be called out in such numbers, as were proposed, by the bill when sent up to the Senate. He wished, if possible, for a restraint on both parties. He was for the amendment.

Mr. MURRAY was of the same opinion. It was not once in ten times that, when an Indian was killed by a white man, the murderer could be convicted. As to the standing army being an object of alarm, he ridiculed that idea. But, at any rate, it was possible to limit the operations of this regiment of eleven hundred and forty men to the Southwestern frontier, if gentlemen were afraid of their being marched up and down the country.

Mr. GILLOX said, that there was something in this question, just like that some days since, about the galleys. If you do not want them, they shall not be forced upon you. He could not see their use in South Carolina. It was a body of militia that was wanted. There are no tumults in South Carolina to be repressed by a standing army. The expedition against Spain is knocked up. What occasion, then, can there be for them? He feared that this corps was only a part of the old leaven, the gilding of a bad pill. He liked this proposal better than the others of the same sort, only because, as the numbers are inferior, the evils are less. Mr. G. had no idea of hiring other people to do for us what we can do for ourselves. He had voted against the twenty-five thousand men, and the ten thousand, and he should also vote against the present number.

Mr. MADISON said, that he would not enter at large into this subject, but there was one circumstance in the business which struck him as very strange. It was proposed to raise a new corps, at a bounty of twenty dollars. The present army wanted more than the whole number of this corps to fill up its deficiencies, and yet the proposal for completing them had been rejected. Thus are we to be at the expense of supporting the skeleton of an army. Was it not better to fill up the old corps, than to put ourselves to the inconvenience of raising a new one?

Mr. McDOWELL rose to correct what had fallen from Mr. ANAS, as to the strength of the Indian nations on the Southwestern frontier. The Choc-taws and Chickasaws were, and always have been, friends to the white people, and ready to fight for them. The Creeks and Cherokees do not, at the most, extend to more than seven or eight thousand men.

Mr. CARVER.—The only use that Continental troops can be of is, to defend posts; and it has been found, by the experience of several years, that posts do more mischief than service. They are established at a distance of fifteen or twenty miles from each other. The Indian parties slip in between them; and the frontier settlers, depending on the protection of the regulars, are not, as they otherwise would be, upon their guard against the savages. The consequence is, that they are frequently murdered; while the only service performed by the Continentals is, that when the militia pursue the Indians, they are prevented by the former from crossing what is called the line. That is the whole service which they have performed in Georgia. In short, against the Creeks, they are good for nothing. Mr. C. wished that gentlemen would frankly say, once for all, that the Georgians did not deserve protection, and then the State would know what was to be done. He insisted on it, that, in Georgia, there were improvements leanings in favor of the Indians. He referred to some persons in office, whom he specified. He believed sincerely that the Senate imagined themselves to be acting for the best; but they could not be such competent judges as persons on the spot. Within the last seven years, there has not been a single instance of an Indian killed, by a white man, unless when the Indians themselves began the quarrel. During the last ten or twelve years, there had been stolen from Georgia, horses to the amount of an hundred thousand dollars. These were often the chief property of poor people, who had nothing else to depend on for supporting their families. Gentlemen say that we have one Indian war already. But if you have two hands, both in the fire at once, will you pull out one before the other? The Creeks are a savage and faithless tribe. Some years ago, a treaty was made with them at New York; and this treaty cost, in presents, sixty-one thousand dollars. Well, before the chiefs got home, a fresh set of murders were committed. A set of Commissioners were next sent, and this embassy cost perhaps an hundred and fifty thousand dollars more. Gentlemen might talk as they thought fit about Indians; for his own part, he would not give the life of one white man for those of fifty Indians. The militia had been always successful against them, and the regulars had always been beaten; this showed the futility of the present amendment from the Senate. Of the successes of the militia, he gave some striking instances, where they had defeated three or four times their own number. As an evidence of the improper leaning on behalf of the Indians, Mr. C. adverted to what had just happened in Georgia. A gang of savages stole some horses. Lieutenant Hay, with a party of dragoons, pursued them, and fell into an ambushade, where Mr. Hay and two men were killed. This was the way that the Creeks kept a peace. Soon after, an Indian, being found in the State, was wounded; and in the correspondence read the other day, to the House, it was so stated, as if the white people were to blame. It made every drop of blood in his heart boil, to hear what he heard in this city as to the character and conduct of his constituents. As a Representative of Georgia, he demanded effectual aid for that State. If the House did not choose to grant it, he warned them that the Georgians would take measures for themselves. It was needless to speak of economy, after squandering such vast sums as he had mentioned, in the purchase of treaties that were never kept. He was against the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. DAYTON rose to contradict one assertion, which had fallen from the gentleman, viz: that the regulars were always beaten by the Indians. If gentlemen exercised their memories, or attended to historical facts, they would see the contrary. General Sullivan had entered the country of the Six Nations, had defeated them, and destroyed their towns, and since that time they had been looked upon as a subdued people. Mr. D. was himself in the army on that expedition, and a witness to the success of the regulars. He was for the amendment.

The question was put that the House do concur with the Senate in the said amendment, and passed in the negative—yeas 26, nays 42—as follows:

YEA.—Fisher Ames, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, George Dent, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glenn, James Gordon, William Hindman, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, Francis Malbone, William Vans Murray, Theodore Sedgwick, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gasebeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Jeremiah Wadsworth, and John Watts.

Ordered, That the further consideration of the said amendments be put off till to-morrow.

SATURDAY, June 7.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for certain purposes therein expressed, was read the third time and passed.

Mr. TRACY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows and families of certain deceased clerks; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making certain alterations in the act establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental Establishment, to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the River Ohio, between the Little Miami and Scioto,' with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also agreed to the resolution directing the Secretary of War to make out, and return to the District Judges, certain lists, in the cases of invalid pensioners," with several amendments; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Resolved, That the sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars be allowed to the clerk employed by the committee appointed to examine into the state of the Treasury Department, to be paid by the Clerk of this House, and charged to the account of Contingent expenses.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee to whom was referred the petition of Robert Lyell, which lay on the table: Whereupon a motion was made, and the question being put, that the House do come to the following resolution thereupon:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War be authorized, and he is hereby directed to place Robert Lyell, a captain in the late Continental Army of the South Carolina line, upon the invalid pension list, with the annual allowance of an invalid captain of the said line, to commence at the time of his discharge, after the fall of Charleston, where he was captured by the British army.

It passed in the negative.

Resolved, That Mr. TRUMBULL, Mr. HINDMAN, and Mr. GILMAN, be appointed a committee jointly, with such committee as shall be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and to notify him of the proposed recess of Congress.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

An engrossed bill making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows and families of certain deceased clerks, was read the third time and passed.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers." Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth disagree to all the amendments to the said bill.

A petition of Thomas Dunn was presented to the House and read, praying to be appointed Assistant Doorkeeper. Laid on the table.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to enable the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental Establishment, to obtain titles to certain lands lying Northwest of the river Ohio, between the Little Miami and Scioto,' and the same being read, were agreed to.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the respective clerks in the several District Courts of the United States to return true copies of the tables of fees payable in the Supreme or Superior Courts of the State in which such clerks reside, to the Attorney General of the United States, on or before the first day of December next.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

The House proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Senate to the resolution directing the Secretary of War to make out and return to the District Judges, certain lists in the cases of invalid pensioners, and the same being read, was agreed to.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making certain alterations in the act for establishing the Judicial Courts, and altering the time and place of holding certain Courts," and the same being read at the Clerk's table, some were agreed to, others amended and agreed to, and others disagreed to.

The House proceeded by ballot to the choice of an Assistant Doorkeeper, to commence his services on the first day of the next session; and upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of Thomas Dunn.

Ordered, That the report of the committee to whom were referred the laws of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, passed the first day of August, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the appointment of a Health Officer."

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Maryland, passed the twenty-eighth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, for the appointment of a Health Officer," and the same being read, were agreed to.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill, entitled "An act for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers," and desire a conference with this House on the subject-matter of the said amendments; to which conference the Senate have appointed managers on their part.

The House proceeded to consider the said message: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth agree to the conference desired by the Senate; and that Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. CARNES, and Mr. McDOWELL, be appointed managers at the same, on the part of this House.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the managers appointed on the part of this House, to attend the conference with the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill for the more effectual protection of the Southwestern frontier settlers, made a report: Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth adhere to their disagreement to the said amendments.

The yeas and nays being demanded by one-fifth of the members present, those who voted in the affirmative, are:

Spragg, Thomas Tredwell, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, and Joseph Winston—30.

Those who voted in the negative, are:

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the joint committee of the two Houses appointed to wait on the President of the UNITED STATES, and notify him of the proposed recess of Congress, reported that the committee had performed that service.

Mr. TREDWELL read a resolution for reducing the salaries paid to the officers of the United States. That of the PRESIDENT was to be reduced, after the present term of appointment, to twelve thousand dollars, that of a member of Congress to four dollars per day, with various others of the same kind.

A motion to print it was rejected. It was then moved to proceed with it immediately.

Mr. WADSWORTH considered it as a good engineering project. It would, he doubted not, be very popular; and as there were only fifty or sixty members in the House just now, they had better take it up, and try to get all the credit of it to themselves. It was, after some conversation, withdrawn by the mover.

Mr. THATCHER moved that such members as had received their pay up to Monday next, and then absented themselves, should be ordered next session to return as much as they had received for the days when absent. The motion was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. W. SMITH laid on the table a resolution for granting a delay to persons who had suffered by spoiliations in the West Indies, of the payment of duties to Government.

Ordered, That there be a call of the House on Monday morning at nine o'clock.

MONDAY, June 9.

LEWEL BENTON, from South Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, and took his seat in the House; the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being first administered to him by Mr. SPEAKER, according to law.

On motion,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House, with the approbation of the SPEAKER, be authorized to employ a third engrossing clerk in his office, for such time, during the next recess, as shall be found necessary, and to pay him for his services, on the SPEAKER's certificate, at the same rate as to the other engrossing clerks, out of the contingent money of the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House, that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the further compensation of clerks in the Auditor's Office;" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the further compensation of clerks in the Auditor's Office," was read twice, and on the question that the said bill be read the third time, it passed in the negative. And so the said bill was rejected.

Mr. BENTON, from South Carolina, informed the SPEAKER, that he had been prevented by indisposition in his family, and a long voyage, from attending his duty sooner in that House. This was the day of adjournment, and he wished to inform the House, that he should decline receiving pay for his travelling expenses, or attendance. He was not willing to qualify himself this day, unless it could be noted on the journals that he had refused any compensation. He took the oath.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of the receipts and payments of public moneys, from the first of January to the thirty-first of March, 1794, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that this House, having completed the business before them, are about to adjourn; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate having completed the Legislative business before them, are now about to adjourn until the first Monday in November next: Whereupon Mr. SPEAKER adjourned the House until the first Monday in November next.

MONDAY, November 17.

The Senate assembled: present as on Friday. The number assembled not being sufficient to form a quorum, the Vice President was requested, by the Senators present, to write a letter to each of the absent Senators, stating that a fortnight has already elapsed without the formation of a Senate, and urging their immediate attendance as necessary to enable Congress to commence the business of the session.

The Senate adjourned to 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, November 18.

AARON BURN, from New York, appeared to-day, which formed a quorum, and enabled the Senate to proceed to business.

Messages were accordingly exchanged between the two Houses, and a joint committee was appointed to wait on the President of the United States, to inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and are ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

Mr. IZARD, from the joint committee appointed for the purpose, reported that the President would meet the two Houses in the Representatives Chamber at 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a letter from Samuel Meredith, Treasurer of the United States, with his account of expenditures of the War Department for the quarter ending the 30th of June last; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate having received a Message from the House on the subject of electing a Chaplain for each House, to interchange weekly, proceeded to the choice of one, on the part of the Senate, and appointed the Right Reverend Bishop WHITE.

WEDNESDAY, November 19.

JOHN EDWARDS, from Kentucky, this day attended.

The Senate, agreeably to appointment, attended in the House of Representatives, in order to receive the President's Communications; and, on their return, the President's Speech was read, as follows:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

When we call to mind the gracious indulgence of Heaven, by which the American people became a nation; when we survey the general prosperity of our Country, and look forward to the riches, power, and happiness, to which it seems destined; with the deepest regret do I announce to you that, during your recess, some of the citizens of the United States have been found capable of an insurrection. It is due, however, to the character of our Government and to its stability, which cannot be shaken by the enemies of order, freely to unfold the course of this event.

During the session of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety, it was expedient to exercise the Legislative power, granted by the Constitution of the United States, "to lay and collect excises." In a majority of the States, scarcely an objection was heard to this mode of taxation. In some, indeed, alarms were at first conceived, until they were banished by reason and patriotism. In the four western counties of Pennsylvania, a prejudice, fostered and embittered by the attitude of men, who labored for an ascendancy over the will of others, by the guidance of their passions, produced symptoms of riot and violence. It is well known, that Congress did not hesitate to examine the complaints which were presented; and to relieve them, as far as justice dictated, or general convenience would permit. But, the impression which this moderation made on the discontented, did not correspond with what it deserved. The arts of delusion were no longer confined to the efforts of designing individuals. The very forbearance to press prosecutions was misinterpreted into a fear of urging the execution of the laws; and associations of men began to denounce threats against the officers employed. From a belief, that, by a more formal concert, their operation might be defeated, certain self-created societies assumed the tone of condemnation. Hence, while the greater part of Pennsylvania itself were conforming themselves to the acts of excise, a few counties were resolved to frustrate them. It was now perceived, that every expectation from the tenderness which had been hitherto pursued was unavailing, and that further delay could only create an opinion of impotency or irresolution in the Government. Legal process was therefore delivered to the Marshal against the rioters and delinquent distillers.

No sooner was he understood to be engaged in this duty, than the vengeance of armed men was aimed at his person, and the person and property of the Inspector of the Revenue. They fired upon the Marshal, arrested him, and detained him, for some time, as a prisoner. He was obliged, by the jeopardy of his life, to renounce the service of other process, on the west side of the Alleghany mountain; and a deputation was afterwards sent to him to demand a surrender of that which he had served. A numerous body repeatedly attacked the house of the Inspector, seized his papers of office, and finally destroyed by fire his buildings and whatever they contained. Both of these officers, from a just regard to their safety, fled to the Seat of Government; it being avowed, that the motives to such outrages were to compel the resignation of the Inspector; to withstand by force of arms the authority of the United States; and thereby to extort a repeal of the laws of excise, and an alteration in the conduct of Government.

Upon the testimony of these facts, an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States notified to me that "in the counties of Washington and Alleghany, in Pennsylvania, laws of the United States were opposed, and the execution thereof obstructed, by combinations, too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the Marshal of that district." On this call, momentous in the extreme, I sought and weighed what might best subdue the crisis. On the one hand, the Judiciary was pronounced to be stripped of its capacity to enforce the laws; crimes, which reached the very existence of social order, were perpetrated without control: the friends of Government were insulted, abused, and overawed into silence, or an apparent acquiescence; and, to yield to the treasonable fury of so small a portion of the United States would be to violate the fundamental principle of our Constitution, which enjoins that the will of the majority shall prevail. On the other, to array citizen against citizen, to publish the dishonor of such excesses, to encounter the expense, and other embarrasments, of so distant an expedition, were steps too delicate, too closely interwoven with many affecting considerations, to be lightly adopted. I postponed, therefore, the summoning the militia immediately into the field; but, I required them to be held in readiness, that, if my anxious endeavors to reclaim the deluded, and to convince the malignant of their danger, should be fruitless, military force might be prepared to act, before the season should be too far advanced.

My Proclamation of the 7th of August last was accordingly issued, and accompanied by the appointment of Commissioners, who were charged to repair to the scene of insurrection. They were authorized to confer with any bodies of men or individuals. They were instructed to be candid and explicit in stating the sensations which had been excited in the Executive, and his earnest wish to avoid a resort to coercion; to represent, however, that without submission, coercion must be the resort; but to invite them, at the same time, to return to the demeanor of faithful citizens, by such accommodations as lay within the sphere of Executive power. Pardon, too, was tendered to them by the Government of the United States, and that of Pennsylvania, upon no other condition than a satisfactory assurance of obedience to the laws.

Although the report of the Commissioners marks their firmness and abilities, and must unite all virtuous men, by showing that the means of conciliation have been exhausted, all of those who had committed or abetted the tumults did not subscribe the mild form which was proposed as the atonement; and the indications of a peacable temper were neither sufficiently general nor conclusive to recommend or warrant the further suspension of the march of the militia.

Thus, the painful alternative could not be discarded. I ordered the militia to march—after once more admonishing the insurgents, in my Proclamation of the 25th of September last.

It was a task too difficult to ascertain with precision the lowest degree of force competent to the quelling of the insurrection. From a respect, indeed, to economy, and the ease of my fellow-citizens belonging to the militia, it would have gratified me to accomplish such an estimate. My very reluctance to ascribe too much importance to the opposition, had its extent been accurately seen, would have been a decided inducement to the smallest efficient numbers. In this uncertainty, therefore, I put into motion fifteen thousand men, as being an army which, according to all human calculation, would be prompt and adequate in every view, and might, perhaps, by rendering resistance desperate, prevent the effusion of blood. Quotas had been assigned to the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia; the Governor of Pennsylvania having declared, on this occasion, an opinion which justified a requisition to the other States.

As Commander-in-Chief of the Militia, when called into the actual service of the United States, I have visited the places of general rendezvous to obtain more exact information, and to direct a plan for ulterior movements. Had there been room for a persuasion, that the laws were secure from obstruction; that the civil Magistrate was able to bring to justice such of the most culpable as have not embraced the proffered terms of amnesty, and may be deemed fit objects of example; that the friends to peace and good government were not in need of that aid and countenance which they ought always to receive, and, I trust, ever will receive, against the vicious and turbulent; I should have caught with avidity the opportunity of restoring the militia to their families and homes. But, succeeding intelligence has tended to manifest the necessity of what has been done; it being now confessed by those who were not inclined to exaggerate the ill conduct of the insurgents, that their malfeasance was not pointed merely to a particular law, but that a spirit inimical to all order, has actuated many of the offenders. If the state of things had afforded reason for the continuance of my presence with the army, it would not have been withholden. But every appearance assuring such an issue as will redound to the reputation and strength of the United States, I have judged it most proper to resume my duties at the Seat of Government, leaving the chief command with the Governor of Virginia.

Still, however, as it is probable that, in a commotion like the present, whatever may be the pretence, the purposes of mischief and revenge may not be laid aside, the stationing of a small force, for a certain period, in the four western counties of Pennsylvania, will be indispensable, whether we contemplate the situation of those who are connected with the execution of the laws, or of others, who may have exposed themselves by an honorable attachment to them. Thirty days from the commencement of this session being the legal limitation of the employment of the militia, Congress cannot be too early occupied with this subject.

Among the discussions which may arise from this aspect of our affairs, and from the documents which will be submitted to Congress, it will not escape their observation, that not only the Inspector of the Revenue, but other officers of the United States in Pennsylvania have, from their fidelity in the discharge of their functions, sustained material injuries to their property. The obligation and policy of indemnifying them are strong and obvious. It may also merit attention, whether policy will not enlarge this provision to the retribution of other citizens, who, though not under the lies of office, may have suffered damage by their generous exertions for upholding the Constitution and the laws. The amount, even if all the injured were included, would not be great; and, on future emergencies, the Government would be amply repaid by the influence of an example, that he who incurs a loss in its defence, shall find a recompense in its liberality.

While there is cause to lament that occurrences of this nature should have disgraced the name, or interrupted the tranquility, of any part of our community, or should have diverted, to a new application, any portion of the public resources, there are not wanting in real and substantial consolations for the misfortune. It has demonstrated, that our prosperity rests on solid foundations; by furnishing an additional proof that my fellow-citizens understand the true principles of Government and liberty; that they feel their inseparable union; that, notwithstanding all the devices which have been used to sway them from their interest and duty, they are now as ready to maintain the authority of the laws against licentious invasions, as they were to defend their rights against usurpation. It has been a spectacle displaying to the highest advantage the value of Republican government, to behold the most and the least wealthy of our citizens standing in the same ranks, as private soldiers, pre-eminently distinguished by being the army of the Constitution; undeterred by a march of three hundred miles over rugged mountains, by the approach of an inclement season, or by any other discouragement. Nor ought I to omit to acknowledge the efficacious and patriotic co-operation which I have experienced from the Chief Magistrates of the States to which my requisitions have been addressed.

To every description of citizens, indeed, let praise be given. But, let them persevere in their affectionate vigilance over that precious depository of American happiness, the Constitution of the United States. Let them cherish it, too, for the sake of those who, from every clime, are daily seeking a dwelling in our land. And when, in the calm moments of reflection, they shall have retraced the origin and progress of the insurrection, let them determine whether it has not been fomented by combinations of men, who, careless of consequences, and disregarding the unerring truth that those who rouse cannot always appease a civil convulsion, have disseminated, from an ignorance or perversion of facts, suspicions, jealousies, and accusations, of the whole Government.

Having thus fulfilled the engagement which I took, when I entered into office, "to the best of my ability to preserve, protect, and defend, the Constitution of the United States," on you, gentlemen, and the people by whom you are deputed, I rely for support.

In the arrangements to which the possibility of a similar contingency will naturally draw your attention, it ought not to be forgotten that the militia laws have exhibited such striking defects as could not have been supplied but by the zeal of our citizens. Besides the extraordinary expense and waste which are not the least of the defects, every appeal to those laws is attended with a doubt on its success.

The devising and establishing of a well-regulated militia would be a genuine source of Legislative honor, and a perfect title to public gratitude. I, therefore, entertain the hope, that the present session will not pass, without carrying, to its full energy, the power of organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; and thus providing, in the language of the Constitution, for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions.

As auxiliary to the state of our defence, to which Congress can never too frequently recur, they will not omit to inquire whether the fortifications, which have been already licensed by law, be commensurate with our exigencies.

The intelligence from the army under the command of General Wayne is a happy presage to our military operations against the hostile Indians, North of the Ohio. From the advice which have been forwarded, the advance which he has made must have damped the ardor of the savages, and weakened their obstinacy in waging war against the United States. And yet, even at this late hour, when our power to punish them cannot be questioned, we shall not be unwilling to cement a lasting peace, upon terms of candor, equity, and good neighborhood.

Towards none of the Indian tribes have overtures of friendship been spared. The Creeks, in particular, are covered from encroachment by the interposition of the General Government, and that of Georgia. From a desire, also, to remove the discontents of the Six Nations, a settlement meditated at Presqu Shore, on Lake Erie, has been suspended; and an agent is now endeavoring to rectify any misconception into which they may have fallen. But I cannot refrain from again pressing upon your deliberations the plan which I recommended at the last session, for the improvement of harmony with all the Indians within our limits, by the fixing and conducting of trading houses upon the principles then expressed.

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

The time which has elapsed since the commencement of our fiscal measures has developed our pecuniary resources, so as to open the way for a definitive plan for the redemption of the Public Debt. It is believed that the result is such as to encourage Congress to consummate this work without delay. Nothing can more promote the permanent welfare of the nation, and more gratefully be more grateful to our constituents.

Indeed, whatsoever is unfinished of our system of public credit, cannot be benefited by procrastination; and, as far as may be practicable, we ought to place that credit on grounds which cannot be disturbed, and to prevent that progressive accumulation of debt, which must ultimately endanger all Government.

An estimate of the necessary appropriations, including the expenditures into which we have been driven by the insurrection, will be submitted to Congress.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

The Mint of the United States has entered upon the coinage of the precious metals; and considerable sums of defective coins and bullion have been lodged with the Director, by individuals. There is a pleasing prospect that the institution will, at no remote day, realize the expectation which was originally formed of its utility.

In subsequent communications, certain circumstances of our intercourse with foreign nations will be transmitted to Congress. However, it may not be unreasonable to announce that my policy, in our foreign transactions, has been to cultivate peace with all the world; to observe every deviation from the line of impartiality; to explain what may have been misapprehended, and correct what may have been injurious to any nation; and, having thus acquired the right, to lose no time in acquiring the ability, to insist upon justice being done to ourselves.

Let us unite, therefore, in imploring the Supreme Ruler of Nations to spread his Holy protection over these United States; to turn the machinations of the wicked to the confirming of our Constitution; to enable us, at all times, to root out internal sedition, and put invasion to flight; to perpetuate to our country that prosperity which His goodness has already conferred, and to verify the anticipations of this Government being a safeguard to human rights.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, November 19, 1794.

Ordered, That Messrs. KING, ELLSWORTH, and IZARD, be a committee to report the draft of an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech this day, to both Houses of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the Report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, which was read, as follows:

"The Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Attorney General, respectfully report to Congress as follows: "That, pursuant to the act, entitled 'An act making provision for the reduction of the Public Debt,' and in conformity to resolutions agreed upon by them, and severally approved by the President of the United States, they have, since their report dated the 16th of December, 1793, caused purchases of the said debt to be made, through the agency of Samuel Meredith, to the amount of one hundred and thirty-nine thousand and seventy-seven dollars and eighty-eight cents, for which there have been paid in specie one hundred thousand and sixty-one dollars and seventy-six cents.

"That, pursuant to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act making provision for the Debt of the United States,' and in conformity to resolutions agreed upon by them, and severally approved by the President of the United States, they have also caused purchases of the said debt to be made, subsequent to their said report of the sixteenth day of December, 1793, to the amount of one hundred and six thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars and thirty-seven cents, for which there have been paid eighty-five thousand eight hundred and thirty-two dollars and ninety-one cents in specie.

"That the documents accompanying this report, marked B, C, D, and E, show the aforesaid purchases generally and in detail, including the places where, the times when, the prices at which, and the persons of whom, the purchases were made.

"That the documents marked A show the proceedings of the accounting officers of the Treasury in respect to the settlement of an account for the expenditure of fifty thousand dollars in purchases which were stated in our former report, at the date of which the said settlement had not been completed.

"That the purchases now and heretofore reported, amount together to two millions two hundred and sixty-five thousand and twenty-two dollars and fifty-seven cents in stock, for which there have been paid in specie, one million five hundred and eighty-one thousand three hundred and twenty-three dollars and sixty-seven cents, as will be more particularly seen by the document marked F.

"On behalf of the Board,

"JOHN ADAMS.

"PHILADELPHIA, November 18, 1794."

Ordered, That this report lie on the table.

THURSDAY, November 20.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with the following communications, to wit:

- No. 1. Judge Wilson's certificate.
2. The Instructions to the Commissioners.
3. The Report of the Commissioners.
4. The second Proclamation of 25th September.
5. The correspondence between the Governor of Pennsylvania and the Secretary for the Department of State.
6. The Report from the Secretary of the Treasury to the President of the United States.
7. General Wayne's Letters.
8. Papers respecting the Creek Indians and the State of Georgia.
9. Letters with respect to Presqu Shore.
10. A Letter from the Director of the Mint.

These papers were in part read.

Ordered, That the further reading thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. KING, from the committee, reported an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in reply to his Speech of the 19th, to both Houses of Congress, which was read.

Ordered, That to-morrow be assigned to take this report into consideration.

FRIDAY, November 21.

The Senate took into consideration the report of the committee, in reply to the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress at the opening of the session; and it was agreed to consider the report in paragraph. On motion by Mr. BURR, seconded by Mr. JACKSON, to expunge these words:

"Our anxiety, arising from the licentious and open resistance to the laws in the Western counties of Pennsylvania, has been increased by the proceedings of certain self-created societies, relative to the laws and administration of the Government; proceedings, in our apprehension, founded in political error, calculated, if not intended, to disorganize our Government, and, which, by inspiring delusive hopes of support, have been influential in misleading our fellow-citizens in the scene of insurrection."

It passed in the negative.

On motion to amend the paragraph respecting the Army, under the command of General Wayne, to be read as follows:

"The pleasure with which we learn the success of the Western Army under the command of General Wayne, is enhanced by the hope, that their victories will lay the foundation of a just and durable peace with the Indian tribes."

It passed in the negative.

On motion to strike out of the paragraph respecting the Western Army, the words: "General and," it passed in the negative.

And the several paragraphs reported by the committee being agreed to, the report was adopted, as follows:

Sir: We receive with pleasure your Speech to the two Houses of Congress. In it we perceive renewed proofs of that vigilant and paternal concern for the prosperity, honor, and happiness of our country, which has uniformly distinguished your past administration.

Our anxiety, arising from the licentious and open resistance to the laws in the Western counties of Pennsylvania, has been increased by the proceedings of certain self-created societies, relative to the laws and administration of the Government; proceedings, in our apprehension, founded in political error, calculated, if not intended, to disorganize our Government, and which, by inspiring delusive hopes of support, have been influential in misleading our fellow citizens in the scene of insurrection.

In a situation so delicate and important, the lenient and persuasive measures which you adopted, merit and receive our affectionate approbation. These failing to procure their proper effect, and coercion having become inevitable, we have derived the highest satisfaction from the enlightened patriotism and animating zeal with which the citizens of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, have rallied around the standard of Government, in opposition to anarchy and insurrection.

Our warm and cordial acknowledgments are due to you, sir, for the wisdom and decision with which you arrayed the militia, to execute the public will; and to them, for the disinterestedness and alacrity with which they obeyed your summons.

The example is precious to the theory of our Government, and confers the brightest honor upon the patriots who have given it.

We shall readily concur in such further provisions for the security of internal peace and a due obedience to the laws, as the occasion manifestly requires.

The effectual organization of the militia, and a prudent attention to the fortifications of our ports and harbors, are subjects of great national importance, and, together with the other measures you have been pleased to recommend, will receive our deliberate consideration. The success of the troops under the command of General Wayne cannot fail to produce essential advantages. The pleasure with which we acknowledge the merits of that gallant General and Army, is enhanced by the hope that their victories will lay the foundation of a just and durable peace with the Indian tribes. At a period so momentous in the affairs of nations, the temperate, just, and firm policy that you have pursued, in respect to foreign Powers, has been eminently calculated to promote the great and essential interest of our country, and has created the fairest title to the public gratitude and thanks.

JOHN ADAMS,
Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.

Ordered, That the Committee who prepared the Address wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and desire him to acquaint the Senate at what time and place it will be most convenient for him that it should be presented.

Mr. KING reported, from the committee, that they had waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and that he would receive the Address of the Senate to-morrow at 12 o'clock at his own house.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:
I lay before Congress copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of New York, and of the exemplification of an Act of the Legislature thereof, ratifying the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Senate and House of Representatives, at their last session, respecting the Judicial power.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, November 21, 1794.

Ordered, That the Message and papers referred to lie on file.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a certificate of notice given to Rufus Putnam and others, agreeably to the order of Senate of 13th of May last, to show cause respecting the claims of the people of Gallipolis; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That Messrs. LANGDON, IZARD, and BURR, be a Committee to report such Rules as may be necessary to compel the attendance of the members of the Senate.

SATURDAY, November 22.

The Senate waited on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and the VICE PRESIDENT, in their name, presented the Address agreed to on the 21st instant.

To which the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES was pleased to make the following Reply:

Gentlemen:
Among the occasions which have been afforded for expressing my sense of the zealous and steadfast co-operation of the Senate, in the maintenance of Government, none has yet occurred more forcibly demanding my unqualified acknowledgments than the present.

TUESDAY, December 2.

Ordered, That Messrs. MORRIS, ELLSWORTH, and CAROL, be a committee to examine the demands of Griffith Jones, Samuel Prioleau, and John R. Livingston, respectively, against the United States, and, if they think proper, to report a bill for their payment.

WEDNESDAY, December 3.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:
I transmit to you an official statement of the expenditure, to the 30th of September last, from the sums heretofore granted to defray the contingent expenses of Government, by acts passed the 26th day of March, 1790, and the 9th of June, 1794.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 3, 1794.

The Message and statement were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion,

"That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to amend and explain the last clause of the twenty-second section of the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States,' which respects the security to be given on obtaining a writ of error."

Ordered, That the consideration of this motion be postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 4.

The motion made yesterday, for a committee to bring in a bill to amend and explain the last clause of the twenty-second section of the act, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," which respects the security to be given on obtaining a writ of error, was considered and agreed to; and Messrs. LIVERMORE, ELLSWORTH, and BURR, were appointed on the committee.

FRIDAY, December 5.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of New Hampshire, and of an Act of the Legislature thereof, ratifying the article proposed in amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the Judicial power.

I also lay before Congress copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of North Carolina, and of an Act of the Legislature thereof, ceding "to the United States certain lands, upon the conditions therein mentioned."

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 17, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I have received copies of two Acts of the Legislature of Georgia—one passed on the 28th day of December, and the other on the 7th day of January last—for appropriating and selling the Indian lands within the territorial limits claimed by that State. These copies, though not officially certified, have been transmitted to me in such a manner as to leave no room to doubt their authenticity. These Acts embrace an object of such magnitude, and in their consequences may so deeply affect the peace and welfare of the United States, that I have thought it necessary now to lay them before Congress.

In confidence, I also forward copies of several documents and papers received from the Governor of the Southwestern Territory. By these, it seems that hostilities with the Cherokees have ceased, and that there is a pleasing prospect of a permanent peace with that nation. But, from all the communications of the Governor, it appears that the Creeks, in small parties, continue their depredations, and it is uncertain to what they may finally lead.

The several papers now communicated deserve the immediate attention of Congress, who will consider how far the subjects of them may require their co-operation.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 17, 1795.

The Messages were severally read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Frelinghuysen, King, Mitchell, Rose, and Strong.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

In my first communication to Congress, during their present session, I gave them reason to expect that "certain circumstances of our intercourse with foreign nations" would be transmitted to them. There was, at that time, every assurance for believing that some of the most important of our foreign affairs would have been concluded, and others considerably matured, before they should rise. But, notwithstanding I have waited until this moment, it has so happened that, either from causes unknown to me, or from events which could not be controlled, I am yet unable to execute my original intention. That I may, however, fulfil the expectation given, as far as the actual situation of things will in my judgment permit, I now, in confidence, lay before Congress the following general statement.

Our Minister near the French Republic has urged compensation for the injuries which our commerce has sustained from captures by French cruisers, from the non-fulfilment of the contracts of the agents of the Republic with our citizens, and from the embargo at Bordeaux. He has also pressed an allowance for the money voted by Congress, for relieving the inhabitants of St. Domingo. It affords me the highest pleasure to inform Congress that perfect harmony reigns between the two Republics, and that those claims are in a train of being discussed with candor, and of being amicably adjusted. So much of our relation to Great Britain may depend upon the result of our late negotiations in London, that until that result shall arrive, I cannot undertake to make any communication upon this subject.

After the negotiation with Spain had been long depending, unusual and unexpected embarrassments were raised to interrupt its progress. But the Commissioner of His Catholic Majesty, near the United States, having declared to the Secretary of State, that if a particular accommodation should be made in the conducting of the business, no further delay would ensue, I thought proper, under all circumstances, to send to His Catholic Majesty an Envoy Extraordinary, specially charged to bring to a conclusion the discussions which have been formerly announced to Congress.

The friendship of Her Most Faithful Majesty has been manifested in checking the passage of the Algerine corsairs into the Atlantic Ocean. She has also furnished occasional convoys to the vessels of the United States, even when bound to other ports than her own. We may therefore promise ourselves, that as, in the ordinary course of things, few causes can exist for dissatisfaction between the United States and Portugal, so the temper with which accidental difficulties will be met on each side, will speedily remove them.

Between the Executive of the United States and the Government of the United Netherlands, but little intercourse has taken place during the last year. It may be acceptable to Congress to learn that our credit in Holland is represented as standing upon the most respectable footing.

Upon the death of the late Emperor of Morocco, an agent was despatched to renew, with his successor, the treaty which the United States had made with him. The agent unfortunately died, after he had reached Europe, in the prosecution of his mission. But, until lately, it was impossible to determine, with any degree of probability, who of the competitors for that empire would be ultimately fixed in the supreme power. Although the measures which have been since adopted, for the renewal of the treaty, have been obstructed by the disturbed situation of Amsterdam, there are good grounds for presuming, as yet, upon the pacific disposition of the Emperor in fact, towards the United States, and that the past miscarriage will be shortly remedied.

Congress are already acquainted with the failure of the Loan, attempted in Holland, for the relief of our unhappy fellow-citizens in Algiers. This subject, than which none deserves a more affectionate zeal, has constantly commanded my best exertions. I am happy, therefore, in being able to say, that, from the last authentic accounts, the Dey was disposed to treat for a peace and ransom, and that both would, in all probability, have been accomplished, had we not been disappointed in the means. Nothing which depends upon the Executive shall be left undone, for carrying into immediate effect the supplementary act of Congress.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, February 28, 1795.

The Message was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of Public Credit, and for the redemption of the Public Debt," was read the third time.

On motion, by Mr. BURN, to strike out the amendment agreed to yesterday, to wit: section 2d, strike out "may be reimbursed at any time," and insert "shall be reimbursed within twenty referred the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to alter and amend the act, entitled 'An act laying certain duties upon snuff and refined sugar,'" reported amendments, which were read.

On motion, to postpone the further consideration of this bill until the next Congress, it passed in the negative; and the amendments reported by the committee being agreed to, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act for continuing and regulating the Military Establishment of the United States, and for repealing sundry acts heretofore passed on that subject," was read the third time.

On motion, it was agreed to amend the 8th section, by adding after "rations," the following words: "or the value thereof, at the contract price, where the same shall become due, and if, at such post, supplies are not furnished by contract, then such allowance as shall be deemed equitable, having reference to former contracts, and the position of the place in question."

Resolved, That this bill pass with the amendments.

The following Messages were received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

It appears, from information which I have lately received, that it may be probably necessary to the more successful conduct of our affairs on the coast of Barbary, that one Consul should reside in Morocco, another in Algiers, and a third in Tunis or Tripoli. As no appointment for these offices will be accepted without some emolument annexed, I submit to the consideration of Congress whether it may not be advisable to authorize a stipend to be allowed to two Consuls for that coast in addition to the one already existing.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 2, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of Delaware, and of an Act enclosed, therein mentioned, to the Constitution of the United States.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, March 2, 1795.

The Messages and papers were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Resolved, That the further consideration of this bill be postponed until the next Congress.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes,'" was read the second time.

On motion to strike out the following words, section 1st, line 4th to 6th, "unless it shall be in continuation of a pursuit (not approaching nearer than five miles to any Indian town) of the particular Indians who shall have recently committed murder, or may be carrying off captives," it passed in the negative.

On motion to dispense with the rule by unanimous consent, and that the bill be now read the third time, it was objected to by Mr. JACKSON.

The bill authorizing the purchase of Indian goods having been read the third time, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the next Congress.

Resolved, That the bill making an extra allowance to certain clerks in the public offices, and to the widows and families of certain deceased clerks, be postponed to the next Congress.

The bill sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to obtain a pension of claim to certain territory," was read the second time.

On motion, by Mr. BURR, to amend the bill, to be read as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to obtain, by purchase or donation, a relinquishment and cession of the whole or any part of the lands claimed by or under the State of Georgia, and without the ordinary jurisdiction thereof."

It passed in the negative.

On motion, by Mr. HAWKINS, to reconsider the amendment last proposed, and to adopt the same, it was agreed to.

On motion to dispense with the rule by unanimous consent, and that this bill be now read the third time, as amended, it was objected to by Mr. JACKSON.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate relative to the title to certain land situate in the Southwestern parts of the United States, with an amendment to strike out "Senate," and insert "next Congress," in line 5th, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the last mentioned resolution; and concurred therein.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized and directed to pay to James Mathers, Doorkeeper to the Senate, out of any moneys appropriated to defray the contingent expenses of the Senate, one hundred and fifty dollars, for extra services.

On motion to dispense with the rule by unanimous consent, and that the bill, sent from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons, and repealing the former act for that purpose," be now read the third time; it was not agreed to.

Mr. BURR laid before the Senate a motion, as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of the said Constitution, to wit:

"That the term for which the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the next Congress are or shall be chosen shall expire on the first day of June next following the third day of March, on which it would have expired if this amendment to the Constitution had not been adopted."

Ordered, That this motion lie for consideration.

TUESDAY EVENING, March 3.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House having finished the business of the session, are about to adjourn.

Ordered, That Messrs. Izard and Morris be a committee, jointly, with such committee as the House of Representatives may appoint on their part, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn without day, unless he may have any further communications to make.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith, and desire the appointment of a committee on their part.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a joint committee on their part to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that Congress is ready to adjourn.

Mr. Izard reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to Congress during this session. Whereupon, it was Resolved, That the Senate adjourn without day.

EXECUTIVE JOURNAL.

THE TENTH SESSION OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, CONVENED ON MONDAY, JUNE 8, 1795.

MONDAY, June 8, 1795.

Pursuant to a call from the President of the United States, in a Circular addressed to the several Senators, informing each that "certain matters touching the public good required that the Senate should be convened on the above day, at the Senate Chamber, in Philadelphia, then and there to receive and deliberate on such communications as he shall then make to them," the Senate assembled accordingly.

PRESENT:

JOHN ADAMS, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate.
From New Hampshire.—JOHN LANGDON and SAMUEL LIVERMORE.
From Massachusetts.—CALEB STRONG and GEORGE CABOT.
From Vermont.—MOSES ROBINSON.
From Connecticut.—OLIVER ELLSWORTH and JONATHAN TRUMBULL.
From Rhode Island.—THEODORE FOSTER and WILLIAM BRADFORD.

From Virginia.—HENRY TAZEWELL and STEPHENS THOMSON MASON.
From Kentucky.—JOHN BROWN and HUMPHREY MARSHALL.
From North Carolina.—ALEXANDER MARTIN and TIMOTHY BLOODWORTH.
From South Carolina.—JACOB READ.
From Georgia.—JAMES JACKSON.

Ordered, That Mr. STRONG and Mr. LANGDON be a committee to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make.

Mr. STRONG reported, from the committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that he informed them he would make some communications to the Senate immediately.

The following message was received from the President of the United States:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

In pursuance of my nomination of John Jay as Envoy Extraordinary to His Britannic Majesty, on the 16th day of April, 1794, and of the advice and consent of the Senate thereto, on the 19th, a negotiation was opened in London. On the 7th of March, 1795, the Treaty resulting therefrom was delivered to the Secretary of State. I now transmit to the Senate that Treaty, and other documents connected with it. They will, therefore, in their wisdom, decide whether they will advise and consent that the said Treaty be made between the United States and His Britannic Majesty.

UNITED STATES, June 8, 1795.
G. WASHINGTON.

The Message, Treaty, and other documents referred to in the Message, were, in part, read, and the further reading thereof postponed.

Ordered, That the Senators be under an injunction of secrecy on the communications this day received from the President of the United States, until the further order of the Senate.

Ordered, That the Secretary procure, printed under an injunction of secrecy, thirty-one copies only of the Treaty referred to in the Message of the President of the United States, of this day, for the use of the Senate.

TUESDAY, June 9.

PIERCE BUTLER, from the State of South Carolina, and FREDERICK FRELINGHUYSEN, from the State of New Jersey, severally attended.

JAMES GUNN, from the State of Georgia, produced his credentials, and, the usual oath being administered, took his seat in the Senate.

Ordered, That there be printed two additional copies of the Treaty referred to in the Message of the President of the United States of the 8th instant.

The papers referred to in the said Message were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, June 10.

The Senate assembled—present as yesterday, and, after deliberation, adjourned to eleven o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, June 11.

The Senate assembled—present as yesterday. The Treaty referred to in the Message of the 8th instant was read and considered.

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, June 12.

JOHN HENRY, from the State of Maryland, produced his credentials, and the usual oath being administered, he took his seat in the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Treaty communicated from the President of the United States, in his Message of the 8th instant.

A motion was made that the said Treaty be published.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

On the twenty-ninth day of December, 1794, the following nominations for promotions were laid before the Senate:

G. WASHINGTON.

First Sub-Legion.

Bernard Gaines, Captain, 30th June, 1794, vice Kersey, promoted.
Bartholomew Shomburg, Captain, 30th June, 1794, vice Harthorne, killed.
John Wade, Captain, 1st July, 1794, vice Peters, promoted.
Rosa Bird, Captain, 6th July, 1794, vice Jeffers, resigned.
And on the 25th day of February, 1795, the following:

Ferdinand Leigh Claiborne, Lieutenant, 30th June, 1794, vice Gaines, promoted.
John Breck, Lieutenant, 30th June, 1794, vice Shomburg, promoted.
Edmund Taylor, Lieutenant, 1st July, 1794, vice Wade, promoted.
Elijah Strong, Lieutenant, 6th July, 1794, vice Bird, promoted.
Rezin Webster, Lieutenant, 11th July, 1794, vice Monford, resigned.

It has since appeared that the resignation of Captain Clay had escaped notice at the War Office, which, rendering the above arrangement incorrect, the issuing of commissions to those officers has been suspended.

To rectify that arrangement, and to fill some vacancies, I now make the following nominations of persons to offices in the Army of the United States:

First Sub-Legion.

Bernard Gaines, Captain, 1st April, 1794, vice Clay, resigned.
Bartholomew Shomburg, Captain, 30th June, 1794, vice Kersey, promoted.
John Wade, Captain, 30th June, 1794, vice Harthorne, killed.
Rosa Bird, Captain, 1st July, 1794, vice Peters, promoted.

Hastings Marks, Captain, 6th July, 1794, vice Jeffers, resigned.
Ferdinand Leigh Claiborne, Lieutenant, 1st April, 1794, vice Gaines, promoted.
John Breck, Lieutenant, 30th June, vice Shomburg, promoted.
Edmund Taylor, Lieutenant, 30th June, 1794, vice Wade, promoted.

Elijah Strong, Lieutenant, 1st July, 1794, vice Bird, promoted.
Rezin Webster, Lieutenant, 6th July, vice Marks, promoted.
Cavalry.
Paul McDermot, Cornet, vice Torrey, killed, to rank from 1st May, 1795.
James V. Ball, Cornet, vice Posey, promoted, to rank from 1st May, 1795.

Corps of Artillerists and Engineers.

Peter A. Drusay, Lieutenant, vice Hutchins, resigned, to rank from 10th April, 1795.

Second Sub-Legion.

William Marla, Captain, 20th April, 1795, vice Andrews, resigned.

Ensigns.

George Salmon, vice Butler, promoted, to rank from 1st May, 1795.
William Scott, vice Claiborne, promoted, to rank from 1st May, 1795.

John Callender, vice Breck, promoted, to rank from 1st May, 1795.
Merriwether Lewis, vice McLean, promoted, to rank from 1st May, 1795.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, June 12, 1795.

The Messages and papers were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

SATURDAY, June 13.

ELIJAH PAINE, from the State of Vermont, produced his credentials, and the usual oath being administered, he took his seat in the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the nomination of John Kelly and others, made by the President of the United States, in his Message of the 12th instant; and

Resolved, That they advise and consent to the appointments, agreeably to the respective nominations.

The Senate proceeded to consider the military nominations contained in the other Message of the President of the United States, of the 12th instant; and

Resolved, That they advise and consent to the appointments, agreeably to the respective nominations.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay these resolutions, respectively, before the President of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Treaty communicated by the President of the United States, with his Message of the 8th instant, and the motion yesterday made thereon, to wit:

That so much of the resolution of the 8th instant as enjoins secrecy upon the Senators, with respect to the communications on that day received from the President, be rescinded.

And the question being taken, it passed in the negative—yeas 9, nays 20, as follows:

YEA—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.
NAY—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong and Trumbull.

And, after progress in the consideration of the Treaty, the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, June 15.

JOHN VINING, from the State of Delaware, attended.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Treaty, communicated by the President of the United States, with his Message of the 8th instant; and, after progress, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 16.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Treaty communicated by the President of the United States, with his Message of the 8th instant; and,

On motion, it was agreed to refer the 13th article of the future discussion of the Senate; and, after progress in the consideration of the 13th article, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 17.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the Treaty, communicated with the Message of the President of the United States, of the 8th instant, and after discussion on the remaining articles, a motion was made and seconded, that it be Resolved (two-thirds of the Senate concurring therein,) That they do consent to, and advise the President of the United States, to ratify the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, concluded at London, the 19th day of November, 1794, on condition that there be added to the said Treaty an article whereby it shall be agreed to suspend the operation of so much of the 12th article as respects the trade which his said Majesty thereby consents may be carried on between the United States and his islands in the West Indies, in the manner, and on the terms and conditions therein specified.

"And the Senate recommended to the President, to proceed, without delay, to further friendly negotiations with His Majesty, on the subject of the said trade, and of the terms and conditions in question."

On motion, it was agreed, that this motion lie for consideration, until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, June 18.

The Senate assembled; and, on motion to adjourn until Monday next, it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Paine, Potts, Read, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

Whereupon the discussion of the 12th article of the Treaty was renewed; and, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, June 19.

On motion. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate the reports of John Jay while in the Office of Foreign Affairs, the correspondence between the Commander-in-Chief of the American Army with Sir Guy Carleton, on the subject of the 7th article of the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, and also Mitchell's map of North America.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the President of the United States.

SATURDAY, June 20.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made on the 17th, respecting the 12th article of the Treaty communicated with the Message of the President of the United States, of the 8th instant.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary of the Department of State, by order of the President of the United States, with the following documents requested yesterday:

Three volumes of the reports of Mr. Jay, while Secretary of Foreign Affairs.

A printed copy of the official papers laid before Congress by the Message of the 5th of December, 1793, and a translation of Mitchell's map of the United States.

MONDAY, June 22.

The Vice President laid before the Senate a Letter from the Secretary for the Department of State, with a "list of the negroes, to which the correspondence between the Commander-in-Chief of the American Army and Sir Guy Carleton relates;" which was read, and, with the document referred to, ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, made on the 17th instant, on the 12th article of the Treaty communicated with the Message of the President of the United States, of the 8th instant; and a motion was made by Mr. Burr to postpone this motion, and to agree to the following resolution:

"That the further consideration of the Treaty, concluded at London the 19th of November, 1794, be postponed, and that it be recommended to the President of the United States, to proceed, without delay, to further friendly negotiations with His Britannic Majesty, in order to effect alterations in the said Treaty, in the following particulars:

"That the 9th, 10th, and 24th articles, and so much of the 25th as relates to the shelter or refuge to be given to the armed vessels of States or Sovereigns at war with either party, be expunged.

"2d article. That no privilege or right be allowed to the settlers or traders mentioned in the 2d article, other than those which are secured to them by the Treaty of 1783, and existing laws.

"3d article. That the third article be expunged, or be so modified that the citizens of the United States may have the use of all rivers, ports, and places within the Territories of His Britannic Majesty in North America, in the same manner as his subjects may have of those of the United States.

"6th article. That the value of the negroes and other property carried away, contrary to the 7th article of the Treaty of 1783, and the loss and damage sustained by the United States by the detention of the posts, be paid for by the British Government; the amount to be ascertained by the Commissioners who may be appointed to liquidate the claims of the British creditors.

"12th article. That what relates to the West India trade, and the provisions and conditions thereof, in the 12th article, be expunged, or be rendered much more favorable to the United States, and without any restraint on the exportation, in vessels of the United States, of any articles not the growth, produce, or manufactures of the said islands of His Britannic Majesty.

"15th article. That no clause be admitted which may restrain the United States from reciprocating benefits by discriminating between foreign nations in their commercial arrangements, or prevent them from increasing the tonnage or other duties on British vessels, on terms of reciprocity, or in a stipulated ratio.

"21st article. That the subjects or citizens of either party, be not restrained from accepting commissions in the Army or Navy of any foreign Power."

And, after debate, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, June 23.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 22d, for the postponement of the motion of the 17th instant, on the 12th article of the Treaty communicated with the Message of the President of the United States, of the 8th instant.

And, after debate, the yeas and nays being required by one-fifth of the Senators present, it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

WEDNESDAY, June 24.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made on the 17th instant, respecting the 13th article of the Treaty communicated with the Message of the President of the United States, of the 8th instant; and

A motion was made by Mr. Read, seconded by Mr. Butler, to amend the motion after the word "specified," as follows:

"And also for obtaining adequate compensation for the negroes, or other property of the American inhabitants, carried off from the United States, in violation of the definitive Treaty of Peace and Friendship, between his said Majesty and the United States, signed at Paris, the 2d day of September, 1783."

And, after deliberation, it was agreed that the honorable mover have leave to withdraw the motion, in order to introduce a motion drawn up with more consideration on the same subject. Whereupon the motion was renewed by Mr. Brown, seconded by Mr. Jackson; and, on the question to agree thereto, it passed in the negative—yeas 12, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Mason, Read, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, King, Livermore, Paine, Potts, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, and Trumbull.

A motion was made to postpone the motion before the Senate, for the purpose of taking into consideration the following motion, to wit:

"That the President of the United States be informed that the Senate will not consent to the ratification of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between the United States and His Britannic Majesty, concluded at London on the 19th November, 1794, for the reasons following:

"1st. Because so much of the Treaty as was intended to terminate the complaints flowing from the execution of the Treaty of 1783, contains stipulations that were not rightfully or justly requireable of the United States, and which are both impolitic and injurious to their interests; and because the Treaty hath not secured that satisfaction from the British Government, for the removal of negroes in violation of the Treaty of 1783, to which the citizens of the United States were justly entitled.

"2d. Because the rights of individual States, are, by the ninth article of the Treaty, unconstitutionally invaded.

"3d. Because, however impolitic or unjust it may generally be to exercise the power prohibited by the tenth article; yet it rests on Legislative discretion, and ought not to be prohibited by Treaty.

"4th. Because so much of the Treaty as relates to commercial arrangements between the parties, wants that reciprocity upon which alone such like arrangements ought to be founded, and will operate ruinously to the American commerce and navigation.

"5th. Because the Treaty prevents the United States from the exercise of that control over their commerce and navigation, as connected with other nations, which might better the condition of their intercourse with friendly nations.

"6th. Because the Treaty asserts a power in the President and Senate, to control, and even annihilate the Constitutional right of the Congress of the United States over their commercial intercourse with foreign nations.

"7th. Because, if the construction of this Treaty should not produce an infraction of the Treaties now subsisting between the United States and their allies, it is calculated to excite sensations which may not operate beneficially to the United States.

"Notwithstanding the Senate will not consent to the ratification of this Treaty, they advise the President of the United States to continue his endeavors, by friendly discussion with his Britannic Majesty, to adjust all the real causes of complaint between the two nations."

Whereupon, on motion, it was agreed to divide this last motion as follows, to wit: "That the motion of the 17th, now before the Senate, be postponed;" and it passed in the negative—yeas 10, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

Whereupon, a motion was made to divide the original motion, made on the 17th instant, and now before the Senate, so as to adopt the first paragraph thereof, ending with the word "specified;" and it passed in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

On motion to adopt the last paragraph of the Proceedings.

[JUNE, 1795.]

said original motion, it passed in the affirmative—
as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bloodworth, Bradford, Brown, Burr, Butler, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Henry, Jackson, King, Langdon, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Paine, Potts, Read, Robinson, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Tazewell, Trumbull, and Vining.

So this paragraph was unanimously agreed to; and it was Resolved, (two-thirds of the Senate concurring therein,) That they do consent to, and advise the President of the United States to ratify the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, concluded at London, the 19th day of November, 1794, on condition that there be added to the said Treaty an article, whereby it shall be agreed to suspend the operation of so much of the 13th article, as respects the trade which his said Majesty thereby consents may be carried on, between the United States and his Islands in the West Indies, in the manner, and on the terms and conditions therein specified.

And the Senate recommend to the President to proceed, without delay, to further friendly negotiations with His Majesty, on the subject of the said trade, and of the terms and conditions in question.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the resolution before the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A motion was made by Mr. GUNN, seconded by Mr. READ, as follows:

"Whereas it is alleged by divers American citizens, that negroes and other property, to a considerable amount, were carried away in contravention of the seventh article of the Treaty of Peace between the United States and His Britannic Majesty:

Resolved, That the Senate recommend to the President of the United States, to renew, by friendly negotiation with his said Majesty, the claims of the American citizens, to compensation for the negroes and other property so alleged to have been carried away; and in case the disagreement that has hitherto existed, relative to the construction in this behalf of the said article, cannot be removed by candid and amicable discussions, that it be proposed, as a measure calculated to cherish and confirm the good understanding and friendship which it is desired may prevail between the two countries, that Commissioners be appointed, in the manner directed by the sixth article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation, lately concluded between the United States and his said Majesty, with authority to ascertain and decide, as well the interpretation of the said seventh article in this respect, as likewise the amount of the losses sustained by the alleged violation of the same.

"But the Senate are of opinion that the negotiation on this subject should be distinct from, and subsequent to that recommended by their act of the 24th instant, respecting the trade and intercourse between the United States and his said Majesty's Islands in the West Indies."

And, after debate, it was agreed that this motion lie until to-morrow for consideration.

THURSDAY, June 25.

The motion made by Mr. GUNN, as last recited, and yesterday referred to this day for consideration, was resumed.

On motion to divide this motion, and to agree to all that is contained from the word "whereas," to the word "same," at the end of the first paragraph of the resolution inclusive, it passed in the affirmative—YEAS 27, NAYS 1, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bloodworth, Bradford, Brown, Burr, Butler, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, Jackson, King, Langdon, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Martin, Paine, Potts, Read, Robinson, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

Mr. Tazewell voted in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. JACKSON, to amend the last paragraph of the motion under the consideration of the Senate, to wit:

"But the Senate are of opinion that the negotiation on this subject should be distinct from, and subsequent to that recommended by their act of the 24th instant, respecting the trade and intercourse between the United States and his said Majesty's Islands in the West Indies," to be read as follows:

"And the Senate are of opinion that the negotiation on this subject be considered as part of the negotiation recommended by their act of the 24th instant, respecting the trade and intercourse between the United States and his said Majesty's Islands in the West Indies."

Whereupon an amendment, after division of a motion, was objected to as not being in order, and on appeal to the PRESIDENT, it was by him determined in the affirmative; and, on the question to agree to the amendment proposed, it passed in the negative—YEAS 11, NAYS 17, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

On the question to agree to the last clause of the original motion, to wit:

"But the Senate are of opinion that the negotiation on this subject should be distinct from, and subsequent to that recommended by their act of the 24th instant, respecting the trade and intercourse between the United States and his said Majesty's Islands in the West Indies."

The yeas and nays were required by one-fifth of the Senators present—

Those who voted in the affirmative, are—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

Those who voted in the negative, are—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

YEAS 18, NAYS 11. So the question was lost, there not being two-thirds of the Senators present in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. BUTLER, seconded by Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, to reconsider this last question,

[SENATE.]

The yeas and nays were required by one-fifth of the Senators present—

Those who voted in the affirmative are—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Butler, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

Those who voted in the negative, are—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Jackson, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Mason, Robinson, and Tazewell.

YEAS 19, NAYS 10. So the question of reconsideration was lost, there not being two-thirds of the Senators present in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. RUTHERFORD, for the question on the resolution as amended, to wit:

"Whereas, it is alleged by divers American citizens, that negroes and other property, to a considerable amount, were carried away in contravention of the 7th article of the Treaty of Peace between the United States and His Britannic Majesty:

Resolved, That the Senate recommend to the President of the United States to renew, by friendly negotiation with his said Majesty, the claims of the American citizens to compensation for the negroes and other property so alleged to have been carried away; and in case the disagreement that has hitherto existed relative to the construction in this behalf of the said article, cannot be removed by candid and amicable discussions, that it be proposed, as a measure calculated to cherish and confirm the good understanding and friendship which it is desired may prevail between the two countries, that Commissioners be appointed, in the manner directed by the 6th article of the Treaty of Amity, Commerce, and Navigation lately concluded between the United States and his said Majesty, with authority to ascertain and decide, as well the interpretation of the said 7th article, in this respect, as likewise the amount of the losses sustained by the alleged violation of the same."

It passed in the negative—YEAS 14, NAYS 15, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Butler, Burr, Gunn, Jackson, Langdon, Marshall, Martin, Mason, Paine, Read, Robinson, and Tazewell.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Frelinghuysen, King, Latimer, Livermore, Potts, Ross, Rutherford, Strong, Trumbull, and Vining.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

It has been represented by our Minister Plenipotentiary, near the French Republic, that such of our commercial relations with France as may require the support of the United States, in detail, cannot be well executed without a Consul General. Of this I am satisfied, when I consider the extent of the mercantile claims now depending before the French Government; the necessity of bringing into the hands of one agent the various applications to the several Committees of Administration residing at Paris; the attention which must be paid to the conduct of Consuls and Vice-Consuls; and the nature of the services which are the peculiar objects of a Minister's care, and leave no leisure for his intervention in business to which Consular functions are competent. I therefore nominate

3d CON.—28

Fulwar Skipwith, to be Consul General of the United States, in France.

I also nominate John Kelly, of Maryland, to be Inspector of the Revenue for Survey No. 1, in the District of Maryland.

William Nichols, of Pennsylvania, to be Marshal of and for the Pennsylvania District, vice David Leuzor, resigned.

John Davis, of Plymouth, in Massachusetts, to be Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, vice Jonathan Jackson, declined.

John Stockton, to be Commissioner of Loans for the State of Delaware, vice James Tilton, resigned.

Dudley Atkins Tyng, of Massachusetts, to be Collector for the District of Newburyport, vice Edward Wigglesworth, superseded; and George Foster, to be Collector for the District of Sunbury, in the State of Georgia, vice James James, who was appointed by the name of John James, in February last, and who has declined.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, June 25, 1795.

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Just at the close of the last session of Congress, I received from one of the Senators and one of the Representatives of the State of Georgia, an application for a Treaty to be held with the tribes or nations of Indians claiming the right of soil to certain lands lying beyond the present temporary boundary line of that State, and which were described in an Act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the 28th of December last, which has already been laid before the Senate. This application, and the subsequent correspondence with the Governor of Georgia, are herewith transmitted. The subject being very important, I thought proper to postpone a decision upon that application. The views I have since taken of the matter, with the information received of a more pacific disposition on the part of the Creeks, have induced me now to accede to the request; but with this explicit declaration: That neither my assent, nor the Treaty which may be made, shall be considered as affecting any question which may arise upon the supplementary Act passed by the Legislature of the State of Georgia, on the 7th of January last, upon which inquiries have been instituted, in pursuance of a resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives; and that any cession or relinquishment of the Indian claims shall be made in the general terms of the Treaty of New York, which are contemplated as the form proper to be generally used on such occasions; and on the condition that one-half of the expense of the supplies of provisions for the Indians assembled at the Treaty, be borne by the State of Georgia.

Having concluded to hold the Treaty requested by that State, I was willing to embrace the opportunity it would present, of inquiring into the causes of the dissatisfaction of the Creeks which has been manifested, since the Treaty of New York, by their numerous and distressing depredations on our Southwestern frontiers. Their depredations on the Cumberland have been so frequent, and so peculiarly destructive, as to lead me to think they must originate in some claim to the lands upon that river. But whatever may have been the cause, it is important to trace it to its source; for, independent of the destruction of lives and property, it occasions a very serious annual expense to the United States. The Commissioners for holding the proposed Treaty, will, therefore, be instructed to inquire into the causes of the hostilities to which I have referred, and to enter into such reasonable stipulations as will remove them, and give permanent place to those parts of the United States.

I now nominate Benjamin Hawkins, of North Carolina, George Clymer, of Pennsylvania, and Andrew Pickens, of South Carolina, to be Commissioners to hold a Treaty with the Creek nation of Indians, for the purposes herein before expressed.

UNITED STATES, June 25, 1795.
G. WASHINGTON.

The Messages and papers therein referred to were severally read, and ordered to lie until tomorrow for consideration.

A motion was made by Mr. BURR, seconded by Mr. LIVERMORE,

"That the resolution of the 8th instant, enjoining secrecy upon the Senators, with regard to the communications on that day made by the President, be rescinded; but that it be nevertheless enjoined upon the Senators not to authorize or allow any publication in print, of the said communication, or any article thereof."

Whereupon a motion was made by Mr. ELLSWORTH, to postpone the motion before the Senate, in order to introduce the following motion:

"That, until the Treaty yesterday before the Senate shall be ratified, it should be left solely to the discretion of the President of the United States, what publication, if any, shall be made of the same."

And it passed in the negative.

A motion was made to amend the original motion, by striking out all that succeeds the word "rescinded;" and it passed in the negative.

And on the question to agree to the original motion, it passed in the affirmative.

On motion by Mr. KING, seconded by Mr. CABOT, to reconsider the motion last adopted, it passed in the affirmative. Whereupon, Ordered, That the Secretary forthwith notify the absent Senators of the above vote of reconsideration.

FRIDAY, June 26.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 25th instant, and the nominations therein contained, of Fulwar Skipwith and others.

Resolved, That the Senate advise and consent to the appointments, agreeably to the nominations respectively.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion by Mr. LIVERMORE, seconded by Mr. BUTLER, that it be

"Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy concerning the communications made by the President of the United States, on the 8th of June, instant, be rescinded."

A motion was made by Mr. READ, seconded by Mr. FOSTER, to postpone this motion; and it passed in the negative.

On motion by Mr. READ, to amend the original motion by adding these words:

"But that it be nevertheless enjoined upon the Senators not to authorize or allow any copy of the said communication, or of any article thereof."

It passed in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bradford, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Gunn, King, Latimer, Marshall, Potts, Read, Ross, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bloodworth, Brown, Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Livermore, Martin, Mason, Paine, Robinson, and Tazewell.

And on the question to agree to the motion as amended, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 18, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Bingham, Bloodworth, Bradford, Brown, Cabot, Ellsworth, Foster, Gunn, King, Latimer, Livermore, Marshall, Paine, Potts, Read, Ross, Strong, and Trumbull.

NAYS.—Messrs. Burr, Butler, Jackson, Langdon, Martin, Mason, Robinson, Rutherford, and Tazewell.

So it was Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy concerning the communications made by the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, on the 8th of June, instant, be rescinded; but that it be, nevertheless, enjoined upon the Senators not to authorize or allow any copy of the said communication, or of any article thereof.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the 25th instant, and the nominations therein contained, of Benjamin Hawkins, and others; and Resolved unanimously, That the Senate do advise and consent to the appointments, agreeably to the nominations, respectively.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay this resolution before the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

On motion,

Ordered, That Mr. CABOT and Mr. BROWN wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and acquaint him that the Senate have finished the business before them, and are ready to adjourn, unless he may have any further communications to make.

Mr. CABOT reported that the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES had no further communications to make to the Senate, than his hearty wishes that, in a speedy meeting with their friends, they may enjoy every felicity.

On motion,

Ordered, That there be paid by the Secretary of the Senate, out of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Senate, to James Mathers, Doorkeeper, three dollars per day, and to Cornelius Maxwell, Assistant Doorkeeper, two dollars per day, as compensation for their respective attendance during this special session of the Senate, over and above their stated allowance.

On motion, the Senate adjourned without day.

Attest: SAM. A. OTIS, Secretary.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE THIRD CONGRESS, BEGUN AND HELD AT THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 3, 1794.

MONDAY, November 3, 1794.

The following members appeared and took their seats, to wit:

From New Hampshire.—NICHOLAS GILMAN, JEREMIAH SMITH, and PAINE WINGATE.

From Massachusetts.—FISHER AMES, DAVID COBB, HENRY DEARBORN, DWIGHT FOSTER, BENJAMIN GOODHUE, SAMUEL HOLTEN, GEORGE THATCHER, PELEG WADSWORTH, and ARTHUR WARD.

From Connecticut.—JOSHUA COIT, AMASA LEARNED, ZEPHANIAH SWIFT, URIAH TRACY, and JONATHAN TRUMBULL.

From Vermont.—ISAAC SMITH.

From New York.—THEODORUS BAILEY, PHILIP VAN CORTLANDT, and JOHN WATTS.

From New Jersey.—JOHN BEATTY, and ELIAS BOUDINOT.

From Pennsylvania.—THOMAS HARTLEY, JOHN WILKES KITTEK, FREDERICK A. MUHLBERG, (Speaker,) and PETER MUHLBERG.

From Maryland.—GABRIEL CHRISTIE and GEORGE DENT.

From Virginia.—ISAAC COLES, SAMUEL GRIFFIN, JOHN HEATH, JOSEPH NEVILLE, ANTHONY NEW, JOSIAH PARKER, and ROBERT RUTHERFORD.

From Kentucky.—CHRISTOPHER GREENUP.

From North Carolina.—THOMAS BLOUNT, WILLIAM JOHNSTON DAWSON, NATHANIEL MACON, and ALEXANDER MEBANE.

From South Carolina.—WILLIAM SMITH.

From Georgia.—ABRAHAM BALDWIN.

A quorum of the whole number not being present, the House adjourned until to-morrow.

TUESDAY, November 4.

Several other members, to wit: from Rhode Island, FRANCIS MALBONE; from New York, HENRY GLENN, JAMES GORDON, and JOHN E. VAN ALLEN; from New Jersey, JONATHAN DAYTON; from Pennsylvania, THOMAS FITZSIMONS; from Delaware, HENRY LATIMER; from Maryland, WILLIAM VANS MURRAY; from Virginia, GEORGE HAYCOCK, RICHARD BLAND LEE, JAMES MADISON, ANDREW MOORE, FRANCIS PRESTON, and FRANCIS WALKER; and from North Carolina, MAT-THEW LOCKE—appeared, and took their seats in the House.

And a quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number, being present, Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate, to inform them that a quorum of this House is assembled, and ready to proceed to business; and that the Clerk of this House do go with said message.

WEDNESDAY, November 5.

Several other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, JOHN S. SHERBURNE; from Massachusetts, WILLIAM LYMAN; from Connecticut, JAMES HILLHOUSE; from Vermont, NATHANIEL NILES; from New York, EZEKIEL GILBERT; from Maryland, WILLIAM HINDMAN; from Virginia, THOMAS CLAIBORNE; and from Georgia, THOMAS B. CARNES—appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Notice was received that the Senate had not yet been able to form a quorum.

Upon this, Mr. DAYTON moved that a committee shall be appointed to examine the business left unfinished last session, and report to the House. He saw no reason for losing time by waiting for the Senate.

Mr. GOODHUE objected to the motion as improper.

Mr. DAYTON challenged the gentleman to point out wherein the impropriety consisted. For two or three weeks the House of Representatives would have full employment, while the Senate, in reality, had none. He was positive as to the legality and expediency of proceeding.

The SPEAKER put the question, and the yeas and noes were equal, each being twenty-five.

The SPEAKER then informed the House that, as a quorum of their number was not present, it would be requisite to adjourn.

The House rose immediately, after adjourning till to-morrow.

THURSDAY, November 6.

Two other members, to wit: From Massachusetts, PELEG CORFAN, and from Virginia, JOHN NICHOLAS, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

FRIDAY, November 7.

Several other members, to wit: From Pennsylvania, JAMES ARMSTRONG, and WILLIAM MONTGOMERY; from Virginia, WILLIAM B. GILES; from North Carolina, JOSEPH WILSON; and from South Carolina, JOHN HUNTER—appeared, and took their seats in the House.

On motion,

Resolved, That a Standing Committee of Elections be appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such matters as shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, touching returns and elections, and to report their proceedings, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

And a committee was appointed of Mr. DAYTON, Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. SHERBURNE, Mr. DEPT, Mr. LEE, Mr. MACON, and Mr. HUNTER.

Ordered, That the Letter from the Governor of Maryland, together with the return of the election of Gabriel Duval, to serve as one of the members of this House for the said State, in the room of JOHN FRANCIS MERCER, who has resigned his seat, which was laid before the House at the last session, be referred to the said Committee of Elections.

MONDAY, November 10.

Several other members, to wit: from New York, THOMAS TREDWELL; from New Jersey, LAMBERT CADWALADER; from Pennsylvania, JOHN SMITH; from North Carolina, WILLIAM BARRY GROVE; and JOSEPH McDOWELL; and from South Carolina, RICHARD WILSON—appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER informed the House that the Senate had not yet been able to make a quorum. Fifteen members only appeared. One more was necessary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

A motion was then made for the House to go into a Committee of the Whole to consider the Rules for choosing committees upon election business.

Mr. BEATTY, of New Jersey, asked why the House of Representatives should wait any longer for the Senate to make a quorum? It had been said that we cannot go on till the Senate are also ready, because we are forbidden by the Constitution. The Constitution says no such thing. This House has already waited a week for the Senate; and it is impossible to conjecture how long it may be obliged to wait, by this method of proceeding.

Mr. BOUNDNOT wanted to learn whether it was proper to have appointed a new Election Committee. He greatly doubted it.

The SPEAKER said that the new committee was formed upon this principle, that the business before the last committee should begin de novo. Perhaps this point had not been sufficiently adverted to, when the resolution passed last week for appointing a new one.

Mr. BOUNDNOT thought that there would arise a considerable inconvenience from all the business beginning over again. Persons who had objected to the return of a member of that House, for example, would have to present a new petition to the new committee, and so on.

Mr. NICHOLAS did not think that this inference, drawn by Mr. BOUNDNOT, followed from the appointment of a new committee.

Mr. DAYTON differed entirely from Mr. BOUNDNOT. Petitions were not addressed to A, B, C, D, E, as members of the Committee of Elections, but to such a committee in general. Therefore, the new one would take up the business as their predecessors had left it.

Mr. BOUNDNOT replied to explain.

Mr. LYMAN considered it as a most absurd idea, that there should be any such thing as a Standing Election Committee for the whole Congress. Was public business to stand still for the arrival of members, dispersed, perhaps, all over the Continent? When a session ended, what further concern had they with keeping of papers? It was their duty to give them back to the Clerk, with a report of what progress they had made, and the House, when it met again, could proceed, whether these members were present or not.

Mr. CARNES was for proceeding to discuss the question.

The SPEAKER, at the desire of Mr. LEE, gave his opinion as to the point of form. He said that it had been the practice of the House to name a Standing Committee of Elections, to last for the whole period of the duration of Congress. But he recommended, as the most regular method, to determine, in the first place, whether it was proper to proceed without the Senate. When once the House had decided on its own competency for doing business, it would then be soon enough to determine what business should be done.

Mr. GOODHUE moved to adjourn. For all the time that would now be additionally lost, it was not worth while to decide the question.

It was observed that there was no instance in the Constitution where one House proceeded to business without the other.

Mr. DAYTON, in reply, observed, that Mr. GOODHUE had made a daily, or near about a daily, motion for adjournment, ever since the House began to meet. He had at this time understood that the principle of the adjournment had been given up, and he must confess that he did not expect to hear any arguments for adjournment on the score of expediency.

The House divided on the motion of Mr. GOODHUE—for adjourning, ayes 33, noes 36.

Mr. DAYTON then moved for the appointment of a committee to examine and report the unfinished business of last session; which was adopted, and a committee was appointed of Mr. BOUNDNOT, Mr. TRACY, and Mr. KIRTEA.

A petition of Moses Myers, of the borough of Norfolk, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, praying to be exonerated from the payment of the duties accruing on certain goods which he imported, and which, after entry thereof made, were sunk and damaged by the oversetting of the craft employed to bring them on shore.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. PARKER, Mr. WATTS, and Mr. COFFIN; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Ordered, That the report of the Secretary of War on the petition of Peter Covenhoven, which was made to this House on the twenty-first of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three, be referred to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

TUESDAY, November 11.

Two other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SHEARJASHUB BOURNE, and from New York, PETER VAN GAASBECK, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER informed the House that one Senator was yet wanting to the making of a quorum. [The Senate consists of thirty members, of whom only fifteen have yet (Tuesday) made their appearance; of consequence, a majority is wanting. The VICE PRESIDENT has, it is true, arrived, but he is not, strictly speaking, a Senator. He does not give a vote in questions that come before the Senate, unless the voices on a division are equal.]

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from James White, enclosing the credentials of his appointment as a Representative of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, in the Congress of the United States, according to the ordinance of Congress of the thirteenth of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven; which were read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. GILBERT, Mr. WALKER, Mr. SWIFT, and Mr. JEREMIAH SMITH, with instructions to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Mr. BOUNDNOT, from the committee appointed to examine the Journal of the last session, and report therefrom all such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined; and also to examine and report such laws of the United States as have expired, or will expire before the next session, made a report, in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MARYLAND REPRESENTATIVE.

Mr. MURRAY informed the House that Mr. Gabriel Duval, a member from Maryland, was now attending to take his seat. This gentleman has been elected in the room of Mr. MERCER.

Mr. NICHOLAS observed that he saw no reason for delaying the admission of the gentleman. He understood the Committee of Elections had the case of Mr. MERCER's resignation under their consideration, and would report immediately; and he understood that the report would be in favor of the gentleman. He did not see the use for so much more ceremony in this case than in that of the former members. They had all been admitted first, and their credentials examined afterwards.

Some remarks fell from Mr. LEE respecting precedent. Mr. MERCER had formerly taken a seat in much the same way, in the room of Mr. PUNKEBY.

The proceedings on this case were read by the Clerk.

Mr. MACON said, that, if gentlemen would only have patience for ten minutes, they would have the report of the committee ready.

Mr. DAYTON immediately after presented this report. A question occurred whether or not it should be read.

Mr. MADISON was for the report being read. It would only delay the admission of the gentleman for a few minutes. It was, therefore, better to receive it, and then take him in. There was a question, if Mr. MERCER was now to appear before the House, could he take his seat? Mr. M. would not undertake to answer the question. It was a delicate one. He would have the report read. If it was favorable, act as concurring with it; if not so, lay it aside, and admit the member from Maryland to qualify, without taking any notice of it.

Mr. PARKER could see no reason why the member might not take his place directly. The House had yesterday full evidence laid before them, under the sanction of the Legislature of Maryland, that Mr. MERCER had vacated his seat. In his room here comes a gentleman with proper credentials. Why hesitate in accepting him? Mr. P. was sorry that any discussion had taken place on the subject.

Mr. MURRAY and Mr. BOUNDNOT spoke each a few words.

Mr. MADISON was still for reading the report of the committee. His object was to accelerate the reception of the gentleman, which would inevitably and properly take place. If the House were to admit him to qualify, without first reading the report, it might hereafter be asked, Why was a report made at all, when the House refuse to read it? It might, on a future occasion, be said, "Perhaps that report has been unfavorable, and the House have contradicted the report of their own committee."

Mr. MURRAY waived his objection to the reading of the report. It was read accordingly, as follows:

"That it appears, from a certificate signed by the Governor of the State of Maryland, in Council, and under the seal of the said State, that Gabriel Duval was duly elected to serve in the House of Representatives of the United States in the place of John Francis Mercer, who had resigned his seat; that the resignation of the said John Francis Mercer appears from his letter, dated the thirtieth of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, directed to the Governor of Maryland."

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the committee, Gabriel Duval is entitled to take a seat in the House, as one of the Representatives for the State of Maryland, in the stead of John Francis Mercer.

The said resolution was again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House. Mr. Duvall then appeared, and the oath to support the Constitution of the United States being administered to him by the SPEAKER, according to law, he took his seat in the House as one of the Representatives for the State of Maryland, in the room of John Francis Mercer.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS.

Mr. TRACY then reminded the House of his proposal for immediately going into a Committee of the Whole on the Rules and Regulations.

Mr. MADISON objected to going into the business abruptly. For his own part, he had lost, or mislaid, his copy of the Regulations. He would certainly not object on his own account. If there was nobody else in the same situation, he should not mention that as any reason to stop their going on. But he was afraid some other gentlemen were in the same situation.

Mr. GOODHUE declared that he was in a similar predicament.

Mr. TRACY.—If we are like schoolboys, and have lost our books, I can have no objection to the procuring of new ones.

It was then agreed to print the Rules and Regulations over again, for the use of the members; and that the House go into a Committee of the Whole on this matter to-morrow.

WEDNESDAY, November 12.

Another member, to wit: CARTER B. HARRISON, from Virginia, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A memorial of Andrew Taylor, of Ulster county, in the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying the liquidation and settlement of a claim for his services as a Deputy Quartermaster in the Army of the United States, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with instruction to examine the same, and report his opinion thereupon to the House.

A petition of Samuel Emery, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, was presented to the House and read, praying that a new register may be granted in the case of the brig Lucy, an American bottom, which was sold in the year 1792 to a person not a citizen of the United States, it being omitted in the bill of sale of the said brig to insert a copy of the register, in consequence of which omission, the Collector of the port of Philadelphia conceives himself unauthorized to grant a new register.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report such Standing Rules and Orders of Proceeding as are proper to be observed in this House; and, after some time spent therein, the SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. TRUMBULL reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and made several amendments thereto.

Ordered, That the said report, with the amendments, do lie on the table.

THURSDAY, November 13.

Two other members, to wit: ANDREW GREGG and DANIEL HEISTER, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took their seats in the House.

The SPEAKER informed the House that there was not yet any appearance of a quorum in the Senate. No new member of that House had arrived, and one of those here had fallen sick.

NEWSPAPERS FOR MEMBERS.

A motion was made that each member be supplied with three daily newspapers. It was mentioned that some applications had been made by a few particular members for leave to have newspapers from the Southern or Eastern States as part of this number. This was objected to as putting the Executive to a needless additional expense. It was, therefore, subjoined, as an amendment to the motion, that they should be newspapers "of this city."

Mr. NICHOLS thought that economy was highly proper, on this, as well as other points. He therefore moved to strike out the word "three" from the motion, and substitute "two." He considered one morning and one evening paper as sufficient for the information of the members.

Mr. TRACY said that it was altogether but a small affair. Some gentlemen had, as he understood, already bespoken three papers, under the expectation that the same number would be granted during this session as during the last.

Mr. NICHOLS then observed, that he would not press his amendment on the House.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House cause the members to be furnished, during the present session, with three newspapers, printed in this city, such as the members respectively shall choose, to be delivered at their lodgings.

A petition of George Campbell, of the State of Maryland, was presented to the House and read, praying compensation for his services as a Captain of Artificers, in the Army of the United States, during the late war.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of receipts and expenditures for the War Department, from the first day of April to the thirtieth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was referred the report of the committee appointed to prepare and report such Standing Rules and Orders of Proceedings as are proper to be observed in this House; and the said amendments being twice read, were, on the question severally put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The said report, as amended, being then again read, and further amended,

Resolved, That the same be established as the Standing Rules and Orders of this House, to wit: STANDING RULES AND ORDERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

First.—Touching the Duty of the Speaker.

He shall take the Chair every day at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned on the preceding day; shall immediately call the members to order, and, on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the Journal of the preceding day to be read.

He shall preserve decorum and order; may speak to points of order, in preference to other members, rising from his seat for that purpose, and shall decide questions of order, subject to an appeal to the House by any two members.

He shall rise to put a question, but may state it sitting.

Questions shall be distinctly put in this form, to wit: "As many as are of opinion that (as the question may be) say Ay;" and after the affirmative voice is expressed, "As many as are of a contrary opinion, say No."

If the Speaker doubts, or a division be called for, the House shall divide; those in the affirmative of the question shall first rise from their seats, and afterwards those in the negative. If the Speaker still doubts, or a count be required, the Speaker shall name two members, one from each side, to tell the numbers in the affirmative; which being reported, he shall then name two others, one from each side, to tell those in the negative; which being also reported, he shall rise, and state the decision to the House.

All committees shall be appointed by the Speaker, unless otherwise specially directed by the House; in which case they shall be appointed by ballot; and if upon such ballot, the number required shall not be elected, by a majority of the votes given, the House shall proceed to a second ballot, in which a plurality of votes shall prevail; and in case a greater number than are required to compose or complete the committee, shall have an equal number of votes, the House shall proceed to a further ballot or ballots.

In all cases of ballot by the House, the Speaker shall vote; in other cases he shall not vote, unless the House be equally divided, or unless his vote, if given to the minority, will make the division equal; and, in case of such equal division, the question shall be lost.

All acts, addresses, and joint resolutions, shall be signed by the Speaker; and all writs, warrants, or subpoenas, issued by order of the House, shall be under his hand and seal, attested by the Clerk.

In case of any disturbance or disorderly conduct in the gallery or lobby, the Speaker, (or Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House,) shall have power to order the same to be cleared.

Secondly.—Of Decorum and Debate.

When any member is about to speak in debate, or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise from his seat, and respectfully address himself to the Speaker.

If any member, in speaking, or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, and the case require it, he shall be liable to the censure of the House.

When two or more members happen to rise at once, the Speaker shall name the member who is first to speak.

No member shall speak more than twice to the same question, without leave of the House; nor more than once, until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

Whilst the Speaker is putting any question, or addressing the House, none shall walk out of, or across the House; nor either in such case, or when a member is speaking, shall entertain private discourse; nor, whilst a member is speaking, shall pass between him and the Chair.

No member shall vote on any question in the event of which he is immediately and particularly interested; or in any other case where he was not present when the question was put.

Upon a division and count of the House on any question, no member without the bar shall be counted.

Every member who shall be in the House when a question is put, shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him.

When a motion is made and seconded, it shall be stated by the Speaker, or, being in writing, it shall be handed to the Chair, and read aloud by the Clerk, before debated.

Every motion shall be reduced to writing, if the Speaker or any member desire it.

After a motion is stated by the Speaker, or read by the Clerk, it shall be deemed to be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received, unless to amend it, to commit it, for the previous question, to postpone it to a day certain, or to adjourn.

A motion to adjourn shall be always in order, and shall be decided without debate.

The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by five members; and until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment and further debate of the main question.

On a previous question, no member shall speak more than once without leave.

Any member may call for the division of a question, where the sense will admit of it.

A motion for commitment, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

Motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House.

No new motion or proposition shall be admitted under color of amendment, as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate.

When the reading of a paper is called for, which had before been read to the House, and the same is objected to by any member, it shall be determined by a vote of the House.

The unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the time of the last adjournment, shall have the preference in the Orders of the Day; and no motion on any other business shall be received, without special leave of the House, until the former is disposed of.

In all other cases of ballot that for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election; and when there shall not be such majority on the first ballot, the ballot shall be repeated until a majority be obtained.

In all cases when there are more members of the House than are eligible, there shall be a previous nomination. If a question depending be lost by adjournment of the House, and revived on the succeeding day, no member who has spoken twice on the day preceding, shall be permitted again to speak without leave.

Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of the Senate shall be necessary, shall be read to the House, and laid on the table, on a day preceding that in which the same shall be moved, unless the House shall otherwise expressly allow.

Petitions, memorials, and other papers, addressed to the House, shall be presented by the Speaker, or by a member in his place, and shall not be debated or decided on the day of their being first read, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order they were read.

Any fifteen members, (including the Speaker, if there is one,) shall be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members.

Upon call of the House, or in taking the yeas and nays on any question, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically.

Any member may excuse himself from serving on any committee at the time of his appointment, if he is then a member of two other committees.

No member shall absent himself from the service of the House, unless he have leave, or be sick, and unable to attend.

Upon a call of the House, the names of the members shall be called over by the Clerk, and the absentees noted; after which, the names of the absentees shall be again called over, the doors shall then be shut, and those for whom no excuse, or insufficient excuses are made, may, by order of the House, be taken into custody, as they appear, or may be sent for and taken into custody, wherever they be found, by special messengers to be appointed for that purpose.

When a member shall be discharged from custody, and admitted to his seat, the House shall determine whether such discharge shall be with, or without, paying fees; and in like manner, whether a delinquent member, taken into custody by a special messenger, shall, or shall not, be liable to defray the expense of such special messenger.

A Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed, to hold his office during the pleasure of the House, whose duty shall be to attend the House during its sitting; to execute the commands of the House, from time to time, either by himself, or a special messenger, to be by him appointed for that purpose together with all such process issued by authority thereof, as shall be directed to him by the Speaker.

The fees of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be, for every arrest, the sum of two dollars; for each day's custody and release, one dollar; and for traveling expenses of himself, or a special messenger, going and returning, one-tenth of a dollar per mile.

Two standing committees shall be appointed at the commencement of each session, to consist of seven members each, to wit:

A Committee of Elections, and

A Committee of Claims.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials of the members returned to serve in this House, and to take into their consideration all such petitions and other matters touching election, and returns, as shall or may be presented, or come in question, and be referred to them by the House.

It shall be the duty of the said Committee of Claims to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching claims or demands on the United States, as shall be presented, or shall or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon, together with such propositions for relief therein, as to them shall seem expedient.

No committee shall sit, during the sitting of the House, without special leave.

The Clerk of the House shall take an oath for the true and faithful discharge of the duties of his office, to the best of his knowledge and abilities; and shall be deemed to continue in office until another be appointed.

It shall be the duty of the Clerk of the House, at the end of each session, to send a printed copy of the Journal thereof to the Executive, and to each branch of the Legislature, of every State.

Whenever confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, the House shall be cleared of all persons, except the members and its officers, and so continue during the reading of such communications, and (unless otherwise directed by the House) during all debates and proceedings to be had thereon. And when the Speaker, or any other member, shall inform the House that he has communications to make, which he conceives ought to be kept secret, the House shall, in like manner, be cleared till the communication be made; the House shall then determine whether the matter communicated requires secrecy or not, and take order accordingly.

Thirdly.—Of Bills.

Every bill shall be introduced by motion for leave, or by an order of the House, on the report of a committee; and, in either case, a committee to prepare the same shall be appointed. In cases of a general nature, one day's notice, at least, shall be given of the motion to bring in a bill; and every such motion may be committed.

Every bill shall receive three several readings in the House previous to its passage; and all bills shall be despatched in order as they were introduced, unless where the House shall direct otherwise; but no bill shall be twice read on the same day without special order of the House.

The first reading of a bill shall be for information; and, if opposition be made to it, the question shall be, "Shall the bill be rejected?" If no opposition be made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without a question.

Upon the second reading of a bill, the Speaker shall state it as ready for commitment or engrossment; and, if committed, then a question shall be, whether to a select committee, or to a Committee of the Whole; if to a Committee of the Whole House, the House shall determine on what day. But if the bill be ordered to be engrossed, the House shall appoint the day when it shall be read the third time. After commitment and report thereof to the House, a bill may be recommitted, or at any time before its passage.

All bills ordered to be engrossed shall be executed in a fair round hand.

When a bill shall pass, it shall be certified by the Clerk, noting the day of its passing at the foot thereof.

Fourthly.—Of Committees of the Whole House.

It shall be a standing order of the day, throughout the session, for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

In forming a Committee of the Whole House the Speaker shall leave his Chair, and a Chairman to preside in Committee shall be appointed by the Speaker.

Upon bills committed to a Committee of the Whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered; the body of the bill shall not be defaced or interlined; but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk on a separate paper, as the same shall be agreed to by the Committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses before a question to engross it be taken.

All amendments made to an original motion in Committee, shall be incorporated with the motion, and so reported.

All amendments made to a report committed to a Committee of the Whole House, shall be noted and reported as in the case of bills.

All questions, whether in Committee or in the House, shall be propounded in the order they were moved, except that in filling up blanks the largest sum and longest time shall be first put.

No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the People shall be discussed the day in which it is made or offered, and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House.

No sum or quantum of tax or duty voted by a Committee of the Whole House, shall be increased in the House, until the motion or proposition for such increase shall be first discussed and voted in a Committee of the Whole House; and so in respect to the time of its continuance.

All proceedings touching appropriations of money, shall be first moved and discussed in a Committee of the Whole House.

The rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committee, so far as they may be applicable, except that limiting the times of speaking.

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor.

Joint Rules and Orders of the two Houses.

In every case of an amendment of a bill agreed to in one House and dissented to in the other, if either House shall request a conference, and appoint a committee for that purpose, and the other House shall also appoint a committee to confer, such committees shall, at a convenient hour, to be agreed on by their Chairman, meet in the Conference Chamber, and state to each other verbally, or in writing, as either shall choose, the reasons of their respective Houses for and against the amendment, and confer freely thereon.

When a message shall be sent from the Senate to the House of Representatives, it shall be announced at the door of the House by the Doorkeeper, and shall be respectfully communicated to the Chair by the person by whom it may be sent.

The same ceremony shall be observed when a message shall be sent from the House of Representatives to the Senate.

Messages shall be sent by such persons as a sense of propriety in each House may determine to be proper. While bills are on their passage between the two Houses, they shall be on paper, and under the signature of the Secretary or Clerk of each House, respectively.

After a bill shall have passed both Houses, it shall be duly enrolled on parchment by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, or the Secretary of the Senate, as the bill may have originated in the one or the other House, before it shall be presented to the President of the United States.

When bills are enrolled, they shall be examined by a Joint Committee of one from the Senate, and two from the House of Representatives, appointed as a Standing Committee for that purpose, who shall carefully compare the enrolment with the engrossed bill as passed in the two Houses, and, correcting any errors that may be discovered in the enrolled bills, make their report forthwith to the respective Houses.

After examination and report, each bill shall be signed in the respective House, first by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and then by the President of the Senate.

After a bill shall have thus been signed in each House, it shall be presented by the said committee to the President of the United States for his approbation, it being first endorsed on the back of the roll, certifying in which House the same originated; which endorsement shall be signed by the Secretary or Clerk (as the case may be) of the House in which the same did originate, and shall be entered on the Journal of each House. The said committee shall report the day of presentation to the President, which time shall also be carefully entered on the Journal of each House.

All orders, resolutions, and votes, which are to be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation, shall also, in the same manner, be previously enrolled, examined, and signed; and shall be presented in the same manner, and by the same committee, as provided in case of bills.

When the Senate and House of Representatives shall judge it proper to make a joint Address to the President, it shall be presented to him in his Audience Chamber by the President of the Senate, in the presence of the Speaker and both Houses.

PETER COVENHOVEN.

The House then went into a Committee of the Whole on the Report of the Secretary of War on the petition of Peter Covenhoven. This unfortunate man had been a sergeant in the Militia of the United States during the late war. A short time after his being called out, he was wounded with a musket-ball in the knee, and was unable for a considerable time to walk even upon crutches.

At last, his wound became tolerably cured, and he was dismissed with a pension. But, some years ago, his wound broke out afresh, and, after a series of excruciating tortures, the affair ended with an amputation of his thigh. The bills of his physicians, and the extra expense of sick nurses, came, in whole, to two hundred and nine pounds.

After reading the report, Mr. Boudinot proposed two resolutions—one for granting the sum of — dollars to defray the expenses of amputation, and the other for augmenting his pension.

Mr. Swift opposed the resolution, as there was no law that authorized the granting of the money and as the House had no title to perform acts of charity at the expense of their constituents. He imagined that this burden should fall on the particular State wherein he resided.

Mr. BOURNOR contended that there was a law for this measure. He said that it had always been customary for Congress to pay the expense of curing its wounded soldiers. Even when the soldiers had no hospital to which they could go, and advanced the money out of their own pockets, it had always been repaid by Government, upon application for that purpose. Now, the case of Peter Covenhoven came exactly within this description. He had been dismissed as cured, and with a lesser pension than he would have been entitled to, had the amputation taken place while he was in the military hospital. He had been considered as a person who could still support some part of his own expenses by personal labor. But the matter turns out quite otherwise. The wound is not cured; for it breaks out in a very distressing manner, and ends in the loss of a limb. It was clear that, in point of justice, the man had two claims—the first for the expense attending his cure; and the second for an augmentation of his pension, since he was now completely disabled. He had been for some years incapable of standing, even upon crutches. It was plain that the House were liable to pay the expenses of his wound; and as to the salary, it was only by an accident that he was entered on the list of pensioners before the wound broke out afresh, and that otherwise he had been put on the highest rate.

Mr. SWIFT replied. He was not convinced by any thing that had been advanced. As to the doctors' bills, he was not sure about their accuracy.

Mr. BEATTY said he could answer to the House for that. He had advised the amputation.

The first resolution, viz: for paying the bills, was agreed to by a majority of 37 against 20, and a committee was appointed to bring in a bill. The second resolution, for augmenting the salary of Mr. Covenhoven, was postponed.

FRIDAY, November 14.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, SAMUEL DEXTER; from Virginia, ABRAHAM VINABLE; and from Kentucky, ALEXANDER D. ORR, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the committee to whom was referred the Letter from JAMES WHITE, enclosing the credentials of his appointment as a Representative of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, made a report, which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

Ordered, That a Committee of Claims be appointed, pursuant to the Standing Rules and Orders of the House:

And a committee was appointed of Mr. TRACY, Mr. FOSTER, Mr. MALBONE, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. HEATH, Mr. CHRISTIE, and Mr. MEBANE.

MONDAY, November 17.

Two other members, to wit: from Rhode Island, BENJAMIN BOURNE; and from South Carolina, ANDREW PICKENS, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A petition of Pierre Egerton was presented to the House and read, praying the patronage of Congress, and an exemption from postage, in aid of a literary work which he is now prosecuting.

Ordered, That the said petition do lie on the table.

A petition of Joab Stafford, of the county of Herkimer, in the State of New York, was presented to the House and read, praying to be allowed an arrearage of pension due to him as a Captain in the Army of the United States, during the late war, or such other compensation in lieu thereof, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said petition, together with the petition of George Campbell, which lay on the table, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

DELEGATE SOUTH OF THE OHIO.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the Letter from JAMES WHITE, together with the credentials of his appointment as a Representative of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio.

Mr. VANS MURRAY moved that the Committee should rise, and that the discussion of this business should be deferred until the Senate had made a quorum.

Mr. NICHOLAS thought that the question had been misunderstood. He saw no difficulty in admitting Mr. WHITE to possession of a seat. He regarded it only as putting an actual law into execution. Neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives had it in their power to contravene this law.

Mr. SWIFT objected to complying with the report of the committee. He thought that it could not be carried into execution, because it involved inconsistencies. If the object of the law referred to, was to admit this person to debate, and not to vote, that was unconstitutional. He was, by that law, to be a member of Congress; but the House of Representatives are not Congress, and, therefore, this person may equally vote in the House of Representatives and in the Senate; while, at the same time, he may interrupt the President consenting to a bill, by giving his advice. The Constitution has made no provision for such a member as this person is intended to be. If we can admit a Delegate to Congress or a member of the House of Representatives, we may with equal propriety admit a stranger from any quarter of the world. We may as well admit the gallery, or a foreign Minister, as this person from the Territory South-west of the Ohio. At this rate we may very soon overturn the Constitution. If this person has any proper title to a seat, it must be in the Senate; it could not be in the House of Representatives, who were not Delegates. The Senate, perhaps, might be called such. His election was nearer the mode of theirs, than that of this House.

Mr. SWIFT, of South Carolina, had no difficulty in declaring that the gentleman was fully qualified to take a seat in that House, by the terms of an express compact with the people. He was convinced that the Representatives have a right to admit those whom they regard as lawfully entitled to a seat in the House, for the purpose of debating. They may admit the Secretary of State, if they consider it as expedient. If this gentleman had applied to the Senate, that body also were authorized to admit him, if they thought it lawful. Under the old Constitution, he would have been a member vis generis. He does not claim a right of voting, but of speaking only; and when the affairs of the Southwestern Territory were agitated in the Senate, he had a right, in his (Mr. S.'s) judgment, to speak and debate in that House also. Mr. S. wished that there had been previously settled another part of this business, viz: by whom the Delegate was to be paid for his attendance. It may be a future question, also, whether he is to be dismissed when the galleries are cleared?

Mr. GILES was not prepared to speak on the subject. On the score of expediency, his present opinion was, that the Delegate from the Southwest of the Ohio should be admitted. He had no objection to the motion of the member from Maryland, [Mr. MURRAY], for the Committee rising, but he would never consent to it for the sake of consulting the Senate. He would agree to it, for the sake of further deliberation among themselves. If the House chose to consult the gallery—a resource for information that he should never wish to see adopted—they had a right to consult it, or to ask advice from any other quarter, notwithstanding the assertion of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DEXTER said, he thought the obstacle should be got over by a formal act of the Legislature. He was clear that the House had a right to consult, or admit to the privilege of debating, any individual whom they thought proper. They might, for instance, admit an advocate to plead, in a particular case; but that was entirely a different matter from allowing him to give a vote on the question before the House. Mr. D. declared that he would vote against the report, as it now stands, not because he thought the gentleman from the Southwestern Territory unentitled to a seat, but because he regarded an act of the whole Legislature as a requisite for his introduction.

It was now moved that the Committee should rise, and report the resolution of the select committee.

Mr. W. SMITH differed from Mr. DEXTER. He thought the House of Representatives was, in itself, perfectly competent to settle the point. He was determined that they ought not to consult the Senate upon the matter. It would be extremely improper to let the Senate interfere. He again adverted to his former position, that the House may, if it sees proper, introduce the Secretary of State to a privilege of being consulted, or any other person who may be thought suitable. But he would never submit to yield the privileges of the House to the Executive. They ought to decide their elections on their own authority, and on no occasion send to inquire of the Senate if such an amendment ought to be admitted. Mr. S. considered the gentleman [Mr. WHITE] as expressly within the present Constitution. He trusted that the Committee would not rise, under any such idea as consulting the Senate; but, if they at present rise, that it would be merely for the sake of obtaining further information.

Mr. MURRAY.—If we could have foreseen this case, I am sure that we should have had a joint committee of privileges from both Houses, as judges. The situation of the gentleman refers to both, and therefore the Senate ought to be consulted on this head. Perhaps he is entitled to a seat in both Houses.

Mr. McDOWELL objected, that an act of the Legislature would never, practically, answer the purpose. The session would be next to ending, before such a law would be passed. In the mean time, the interest of the people Southwest of the Ohio is agitated in a question, and their Delegate is condemned to silence. The members generally admit, in substance, that he ought to be received into this House. He wished, therefore, that they would take a vote on the resolution of the select committee. He would object altogether to the proposal of the member from Maryland, for an act of the Legislature, or any consultation with the Senate. Mr. McD. was for admitting the member to his seat.

Mr. BOURNOR observed, that it was universally agreed that the old law for accepting such a member as a Delegate of Congress, cannot be executed in its full sense. The gentleman ought, in his opinion, to go where members elected by Legislatures went, that is to say, to the Senate. There was no pretence for his admission among the Representatives of the people. If he had any right, it must be in the other House. He thought this a very important question, and that it deserved more consideration than it had yet received. Mr. B. was not prepared to vote; but, if he was forced to give his voice at present, he should be for remitting the gentleman to the Senate. He thought that there should be an act of the whole Legislature. He should vote for the Committee rising.

Mr. DAYTON said, that he should vote against the motion of the Maryland member, for the rising of the Committee. He was against the object of this motion. He agreed entirely with the report of the select committee for receiving the Southwestern member immediately, as he had a right to a seat, founded on an original compact, which gave it to him. He objected to any concurrence of the Senate being asked. As to consulting persons out of doors, the House had a right to call Heads of Departments to give their opinions on any particular subject, if they thought proper. Mr. D. mentioned some cases of this nature, where such an expedient had been used.

Mr. GILES mentioned one reason against the Committee rising, which was, that the House had no other business before it. He then read an amendment to the resolution of the select committee, as a middle course, that would embrace the ideas of all parties.

Mr. DEXTER repeated some of his former reasons for preferring an act of the Legislature.

The question was called for, and put by the Chairman, Shall the Committee now rise, and report progress? It was decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 39.

The question was then put on the resolution, as given by the Committee. Mr. GILES again proposed his amendment. This was, that after the word "debating," in the resolution, there should be added, "upon any question touching the rights and interests of people in the Territory of the United States Southwest of the Ohio." The object was to narrow the power of the Delegate.

Mr. SMITH was for his being admitted to deliberate on every subject, or none at all.

Mr. GILES declared that he was very well pleased with the resolution, as it originally stood. He had only suggested this amendment, that he might get the resolution through the House. He therefore withdrew his motion.

Mr. BALDWIN did not see that the question was of much importance. When a member was permitted to speak, but forbidden to vote, his situation was, no doubt, infinitely higher than that of strangers in the gallery, that of an advocate allowed to plead at the bar of the House, or that of a printer who came only to take notes; but still it was extremely short of the situation of a member of Congress. This would be more especially the case, if his right of debating was restricted to the affairs of the Northwest and Southwest Territory. Mr. B. could see nothing in the new Constitution that made an exclusion of the Delegate from the Southwest of the Ohio. This privilege had been solemnly promised to those people, upon three different occasions. When they belonged to the State of South Carolina, they sent a Representative [Mr. SAVINIA] to Congress; and they separated into a new State, under the promise of this privilege. But now, we have made a discovery, that these laws cannot be put into execution. It is a great pity that we had not made this discovery sooner. Mr. B. rejected all ideas of referring this matter to the Senate. When the latter had any question of that kind, that concerned themselves, they would, no doubt, judge for themselves, and that just as properly as the House of Representatives. As to the pay of this gentleman, that might be an after question. He was clear that there at present existed no law which could make out that. The House may hereafter, if they see fit, pass a law respecting it. But, in the meantime, Mr. B. was satisfied that these people had a claim for a Delegate, which could not be got rid of by the House.

Mr. SWIFT thought that it would be better to erect these people into a new State, and then the privilege would be of some real use to them. He was still of opinion that the Constitution admits of no such Delegate as this person is intended to be. He is a new kind of character, unknown to it. This person is sui generis. If the Constitution knows anything about him, then take him; if not, reject him. As to taking advice from the gallery, Mr. S. seemed to think he had been misunderstood. To admit a person within the bar for the purpose of consulting him, was a quite different thing from permitting the gallery, like this person, to come and take a permanent seat among the members, for the purpose of regularly debating. Mr. S. never meant to debar the House from taking information wherever they could find it.

Mr. MURRAY was concerned that he found himself obliged to vote against the resolution of the Committee. He still hoped that the gentleman would have a seat, but that the Senate would first be consulted.

Mr. WINGATE moved an amendment to take the resolution, by adopting these words, "to a seat in Congress as Delegate to Congress."

Mr. MADISON said, that the resolution, as passed by the select committee, was so properly expressed, that he did not believe it could admit of any amendment or alteration whatever.

The Committee of the Whole House then divided on the resolution, when there appeared a very large majority in favor of reporting it as it first stood, and consequently for admitting Mr. WHITE as a Delegate. The Committee then rose.

TUESDAY, November 18.

Another member, to wit: THEODORE SEDGWICK, from Massachusetts, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

A memorial of James Crawford, of the city of Philadelphia, merchant, was presented to the House and read, praying that a new register may be granted in the case of the brig Betsy, an American bottom, taken by the British at St. Pierre's, in the Island of Martinique, in the month of February last; the said brig being condemned, and her original register detained by the captors.

Ordered, That the said memorial, together with the petition of Samuel Emery, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. GOODRICH, and Mr. CADWALADER; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

DELEGATE SOUTH OF THE OHIO.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the Letter from JAMES WHITE, enclosing the credentials of his appointment as a Representative of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, to which the Committee of the Whole House reported no amendment. Whereupon, the said report being again read at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

"That, by the Ordinance for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio, section nine, it is provided, 'that, so soon as there shall be five thousand free male inhabitants of full age in the District, upon giving proof thereof to the Governor, they shall receive authority to elect Representatives to represent them in a General Assembly; and by the 12th section of the Ordinance, 'as soon as a Legislature shall be formed in the District, the Council and House, assembled in one room, shall have authority, by joint ballot, to elect a Delegate to Congress, who shall have a seat in Congress, with a right of debating, but not of voting, during this temporary government.' Full effect is given to this Ordinance by act of Congress, August 7, 1799.

"That, by the Deed of Cession of the Territory South of the river Ohio, to the United States, in the fourth article, it is also provided 'that the inhabitants of the said Territory shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages, set forth in the Ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the Western Territory; that is to say, Congress shall assume the government of the said Territory, which they shall execute in a manner similar to that which they support in the Territory West of the Ohio, and shall never bar or deprive them of any privilege which the People in the Territory West of the Ohio enjoy.'

"The cession, on these conditions, was accepted by act of Congress, on the 2d of April, 1790.

"By an act passed the 26th of May, 1790, for the government of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, it is enacted, 'that the inhabitants shall enjoy all the privileges, benefits, and advantages, set forth in the Ordinance of the late Congress for the government of the Territory of the United States Northwest of the river Ohio. And the government of the said Territory South of the river Ohio, shall be similar to that which is now exercised in the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio; except so far as is otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress of the present session, entitled 'An act to accept a cession of the claim of the State of North Carolina to a certain district of Western Territory.' The committee are of opinion that James White has been duly elected as Delegate from the Territory of the United States South of the Ohio, on the terms of the foregoing acts; they therefore submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That James White be admitted to a seat in this House as a Delegate from the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, with a right of debating, but not of voting."

Mr. MADISON said, that in new cases, there often arose a difficulty by applying old names to new things. The proper definition of Mr. WHITE is to be found in the Laws and Rules of the Constitution. He is not a member of Congress, therefore, and so cannot be directed to take an oath, unless he chooses to do it voluntarily.

Mr. MURRAY moved that Mr. WHITE should be required to take the oath.

Mr. W. SMITH observed, that the Constitution only required members and the Clerk to take the oath. The gentleman was not a member. It does not even appear for what number of years he is elected. In fact, he is no more than an Envoy to Congress. Instead of being called Delegate to Congress, had he been plainly called an Envoy, the difficulty would have vanished. He is not a Representative from, but an officer deputed by the people of the Western Territory. It is very improper to call on this gentleman to take such an oath, any more than any civil officer in the State of Pennsylvania. Mr. S. did not consider him as coming even within the Post Office law, (viz: for franking letters.) He is not entitled to pay, unless a law shall be passed for that end.

Mr. GILES agreed with the gentleman who spoke last, as to the impropriety of demanding an oath. Mr. LYMAN was for it.

Mr. DAYTON was against the oath. Call him what you will, a member, a Delegate, or, if you please, a nondescript. It would be wrong to accept his oath, even if he should offer it. He is not a member. He cannot vote, which is the essential part. It is said that he can argue, and by that means influence the votes of the House. But so also a printer may be said to argue and influence, when he comes to this House, take notes, and prints them in the newspapers.

Mr. BOUDINOT. As the House had set out on a wrong principle, it was natural that, in their subsequent progress, they should wander further and further from the point. But, as the House had now given their decision, he acquiesced in it. It was, however, a strange kind of thing to have a gentleman here arguing, who was not bound by an oath. He could never reconcile it.

Several other members spoke. The House divided on the question, "Shall the Delegate take an oath as a member?" Ayes 32, nays 42—majority against the motion, 10. A message from the Senate informed the House that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That the petition of Pierre Egton, which lay on the table, be referred to Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. MADISON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may think proper to make to them.

Ordered, That Mr. BOUDINOT, Mr. DEARBORN, and Mr. GILMAN, be appointed a committee on the part of this House for the purpose expressed in the message from the Senate.

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress for the present session, one by each House, to interchange weekly.

Ordered, That the Clerk of this House do carry the said resolution to the Senate, and desire their concurrence.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the Joint Committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may think proper to make to them, reported that the Committee had performed that service, and that the PRESIDENT signified to them that he would make a communication to both Houses of Congress, to-morrow at twelve o'clock, in the Representatives' Chamber.

Militia Service.

[NOVEMBER, 1794.]

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill extending the privilege of franking to JAMES WHITE, the Delegate from the Southwestern Territory; and making provision for his compensation; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. THATCHER, and Mr. MACON, be the said committee.

WEDNESDAY, November 19.

Another member, to wit: THOMAS SCOTT, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat in the House.

A memorial of Jose Roiz Silva, of the city of New York, merchant, was presented to the House and read, praying that the sum of two thousand five hundred and twenty-one dollars and sixty cents may be refunded to him, it being the difference in the amount of duties on a quantity of wines imported by the memorialist, and which, through mistake, was exacted from him by the Collector of the port of New York, beyond the legal duties.

Ordered, That the said memorial be referred to Mr. WATTS, Mr. COFFIN, and Mr. MALBONE; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report of the Commissioners for purchasing the Public Debt, stating the amount of their purchases and other proceedings since their report of the sixteenth of December, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House is now ready to attend them in receiving the communication from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, agreeably to his notification to both Houses yesterday; and that the Clerk of this House do go with the said message.

The Senate attended and took seats in the House; when, both Houses being assembled, the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES came into the Representatives' Chamber, and delivered his Address to them. (For which, see Proceedings of the Senate, ante page 784.)

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES then withdrew, and the two Houses separated.

Ordered, That the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses be committed to a Committee of the Whole House tomorrow.

THURSDAY, November 20.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM FINDLEY, from Pennsylvania, appeared and took his seat in the House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said Speech under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that a respectful Address ought to be presented by the House of Representatives to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, at the commencement of this session, containing assurances that this House will take into consideration the various and important matters recommended to their attention.

Ordered, That Mr. MADISON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. SCOTT, be appointed a committee to prepare an Address, pursuant to the said resolution. A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have agreed to the resolution of this House for the appointment of two Chaplains to Congress for the present session, and have elected the Right Reverend Bishop WHITE on their part.

The House then proceeded by ballot to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress, on the part of this House; and upon examining the ballots, a majority of the votes of the whole House was found in favor of the Reverend ASHBEL GREEN.

A message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, with sundry documents referred to in the PRESIDENT'S Speech to both Houses, from No. 1 to No. 8, inclusive, relative to the insurrection in the counties of Washington and Alleghany, in the State of Pennsylvania; also, sundry communications from General Wayne; from the Governor of Georgia; from the Superintendent of Indian Affairs in the Creek nation; and respecting the establishment of a post by the State of Pennsylvania at Presqu'isle; together with a Letter from the Director of the Mint.

The said documents and communications were partly read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FRIDAY, November 21.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill for the relief of John R. Livingston; and that Mr. COIT, Mr. GORDON, and Mr. NEVILLE, be the said committee.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill extending the privilege of franking to JAMES WHITE, the Delegate from the Southwestern Territory, and making provision for his compensation; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented an Address to the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

MILITIA SERVICE.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved a resolution to the following purport:

Resolved, as the opinion of this Committee, That provision ought to be made by law for continuing in the service a portion of the militia of the United States, to be stationed in the Western counties of Pennsylvania for such period as shall be found necessary to secure the execution of the laws."

Mr. GILES said he should certainly not oppose the motion; but he hoped that when the Committee contemplated should report a bill, they would be able to give every information relative to the situation of the Western counties. He was sensible that despatch was necessary, as the provision was required to be completely enacted within thirty days; but he wished for information to determine what force would be required, and for how long a time they would probably be wanted.

Mr. DAYTON agreed that information would be wanted to determine the number of troops that would be required; but if there existed an opinion that no provision of the kind is necessary, the business should be opposed in its present stage. For his part he was fully convinced that something was necessary. As to information, he wished it to come officially to the House rather than through any committee.

Mr. SEDGWICK hoped the motion would be agreed to. He had information sufficient at the present time to convince him that it was necessary a force should be stationed; it would be a subject of future inquiry what force would be necessary.

Mr. NICHOLAS said that from information he had of persons from the Western counties, he believed that some force should be stationed there. There were a number of persons still lurking about who had not returned to their homes since the breaking out of the disturbances.

Mr. FITZSIMONS wished the motion agreed to. The House are in possession, he conceived, of sufficient information to pass the resolution. When the bill comes before them, the force required, and the time of service, would become objects of consideration. Some members have information on this subject which they no doubt will communicate. The business presses.

Mr. MURRAY made mention of a letter received from a General officer, dated the 13th of November, which states that 1,000 of the insurgents have gone down the Ohio unarmed, and that 300 armed had crossed the Ohio, and declared it as their intention to return as soon as the Army should retire.

The resolution was agreed to unanimously, reported and adopted by the House, and Messrs. MURRAY, HILLHOUSE, and GILES, appointed a committee to bring in a bill.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to both Houses of Congress; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the following resolutions, which were read as follows, viz:

1. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that provision ought to be made by law for raising a force, to be composed of the Militia of the United States, to be stationed within the Western counties of Pennsylvania, for such period as may be requisite to secure the execution of the laws.

2. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that further provision ought to be made by law for the redemption of the Public Debt.

3. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that a plan ought to be prepared for the better organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States; and further to provide for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

4. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that inquiry ought to be made whether the fortifications, which have already been licensed by law, are commensurate with the public exigence.

5. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee that so much of the President's Speech as relates to improving of harmony with the Indian nations within our limits, by fixing and conducting of trading houses, should be referred to a special committee to report thereon.

The first, second, third, and fifth resolutions, were severally read the second time, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

The fourth resolution was read a second time, amended at the Clerk's table, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to direct the proper officers to lay before this House a statement of the progress made in the fortifications licensed by law.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the first resolution, and that Mr. MURRAY, Mr. HILLHOUSE, and Mr. GILES, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and report a plan pursuant to the second resolution, and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. ANES, Mr. FITZSIMONS, Mr. DUVALL, and Mr. NICHOLAS, be the said committee.

Ordered, That Mr. GILES, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. LOCKE, and Mr. VAN CORTLANDT, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the first part of the third resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. DAYTON, Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. McDOWELL, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the second part of the third resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. BAILEY and Mr. ARMSTRONG be appointed a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES with the fourth resolution.

Ordered, That Mr. PARKER, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. BOWDINOT, Mr. FINDLEY, and Mr. GREENUP, be appointed a committee, pursuant to the fifth resolution.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and
of the House of Representatives:

I lay before Congress copies of a Letter from the Governor of the State of New York, and of the explanation of an Act of the Legislature thereof, ratifying the amendment of the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Senate and House of Representatives, at their last session, respecting the Judicial power.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, November 21, 1794.

H. or R.]

President's Speech.

[NOVEMBER, 1794.]

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table. The House resumed the reading of the papers, communicated yesterday, by Message, from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; and made a farther progress therein.

MONDAY, November 24.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House then went into a Committee, Mr. COSS in the Chair, on the draft of the Address in answer to the President's Speech. The Address was read by the Clerk.

Mr. DAYTON rose to express his surprise that, in the Address, no notice whatever had been taken of that part of the Speech which related to the army under General Wayne, and of the readiness of the House to concur in the requisite measures for a proper organization of the militia. The success of the troops under General Wayne might contribute very materially to putting an end to the Indian war, and thus add to the power of discharging a part of the Public Debt. He then proposed the following motion:

"We are deeply impressed with the importance of an effectual organization of the militia. We rejoice at the intelligence of the advanced and success of the Army under the command of General Wayne; whether we regard it as a proof of the perseverance, prowess, and superiority of our troops, or as a happy prelude to our military operations against the hostile Indians, and a probable prelude to the establishment of a lasting peace upon terms of candor, equity, and good neighborhood—our pleasure derived from this source is the greater, as it increases the probability of sooner restoring a part of the public resources to the desirable object of reducing the Public Debt."

Mr. MADISON had no objection to this amendment. He read a second amendment containing an answer to the following part of the President's Speech:

"My policy in our foreign transactions has been to cultivate peace with all the world, to observe treaties with pure and absolute faith, to check every deviation from the line of impartiality, to explain what may have been misapprehended, and correct what may have been injurious to any nation; and having thus acquired the right, to lose no time in acquiring the ability, to insist upon justice being done to ourselves."

Mr. MADISON moved that his additional amendment should be inserted immediately after that of Mr. DAYTON, to this effect:

"Solicitous also, as we are, for the preservation of peace with all nations, we cannot otherwise than warmly approve of a policy in our foreign transactions, which never loses sight of that blessing."

Mr. DAYTON was willing that the clause should be annexed to his original motion.

Mr. HILLHOUSE wished the word your substituted for the article a (marked in italic in the clause last quoted,) that the policy of the Executive might be more clearly pointed to.

Mr. SMITH, of New Hampshire, said he had drafted an amendment to the Address, that contained the idea the gentleman last up wished to be expressed, and another. He read it in his place. It was to the following purport:

"Your policy in our foreign transactions, as it shows an ardent disposition for peace, has our hearty approbation, and we assure you we shall omit nothing on our part towards acquiring the ability, as well as right, of exacting from all nations the fulfilment of their duties towards us."

Mr. DAYTON, in the meantime, observed that there was no necessary connexion between his amendment and that of Mr. MADISON. He therefore hoped that his, with respect to General Wayne and the army on the Northwestern frontier, would pass in the meantime. This was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT said that the House had been often obliged to the pen of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MADISON.) Perhaps that gentleman himself would be disposed to think the amendment of the member from Connecticut, [Mr. HILLHOUSE,] better than his own.

Mr. NICHOLAS preferred the amendment of Mr. MADISON to any other that had been proposed. He imagined that the one offered by Mr. W. SMITH pledged the House to approve of the particular measures adopted by the President as to foreign Powers. In this Mr. N. referred specially to the mission of Mr. Jay to the Court of London. We are not acquainted with the individual powers or instructions granted to that Envoy. Our approbation has no datum on which it can proceed, and how are the Committee to pretend approbation for what they do not know? The President would laugh at such conduct. The amendment of Mr. MADISON is more guarded. It goes to approve general principles, but not individual measures.

Mr. HILLHOUSE thought that he had been misunderstood. His amendment did not go beyond general approbation of principles. He never intended indiscriminate applause.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that the House had got themselves into a labyrinth of amendments upon amendments. It was very difficult to word an Address in such a way as to be entirely free from exception. The matter had sunk into a mere verbal dispute. He therefore moved that the Committee of the Whole now rise, and the draft be referred back to the special committee.

Mr. DAYTON knew not why the Envoy [Mr. Jay] had been sent to Europe. He did not know what were his instructions, and he never would approve, or say that he approved, of what he did not know. He was, therefore, against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut. That of the gentleman from Virginia went quite far enough. Rather than vote for such a thing, he would reject the whole.

Mr. GILES objected to the motion for the rising of the Committee. The President has not, in his Speech, said that the House are informed as to the motives of his measures, or the extent of the instructions to his Envoy. Why, then, shall the House think themselves obliged to approve them? There has already intervened a delay of several days since the Speech was delivered. If an answer is to be given at all, it ought to be given immediately. To rise and refer the draft of the Address back again to the committee will not mend the matter.

The motion for rising was negatived. Mr. NICHOLAS then rose in defence of Mr. MADISON's amendment. He thought the House should not bow so much to the Executive as to approve of his proceedings without knowing what they are. Gentlemen say that they do not mean an implicit approbation. Why, then, hazard words that infer it? He would go as far in thanking the President as any person, with propriety, could go.

Mr. SARGENT insisted that the amendment of the member from Connecticut, [Mr. HILLHOUSE,] was preferable to the other. The President has said that his policy in regard to foreign nations is founded on justice. We approve of that. He recites his motives. They are also approved. Where, then, is the danger of expressing a general approbation? Would it be proper to give an approbation that cannot be appropriate, and that has no definite meaning? Mr. S. was far from designing to approve, explicitly or implicitly, what the House were not acquainted with. He only intended to convey a general sentiment of approbation; and he saw nothing more than this in the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILLHOUSE never designed indiscriminate approbation; nor had he any secret meaning couched under the words of his amendment. When he had any thing to say to the House, he came honestly and told them in plain words what he would be at. He meant to express his applause of pacific and equitable measures. As to the question so often referred to, [the embassy of Mr. Jay,] he solemnly declared that it never was in his mind to express any thing about it. It would come before another body.

Mr. MADISON imagined that, in his motion as now worded, every person might see substantial approbation.

Mr. ARES.—Jealousy may become habitual as well as confidence. Nothing but a habit of jealousy could have found any thing of a secret in this verbal distinction of your policy instead of a policy. The distinction was trifling, but, if there must be one, he preferred the amendment of Mr. HILLHOUSE. His reasons for this preference were so minute that they, perhaps, had little more value than what his imagination chose to give them. In the mean time, nobody will suppose that we do not approve of the policy of the President in preferring pacific measures, because the system of peace is now preferred all over the Continent of America.

Mr. DAYTON rose to make a reply to "remarks so libelous."

Mr. ARES here rose again and said that the gentleman certainly could not mean him.

I mean that gentleman, Mr. SPEAKER, said Mr. DAYTON, pointing to Mr. ARES. He has accused me of "habits of jealousy." To this charge Mr. D. rejoined with some warmth. He again declared that he never would pledge himself to approve of the mission of Mr. Jay till he should learn what were that gentleman's instructions. He meant to draw this line of distinction, to give approbation of general principles, but not of particular measures. The former he considered as implied in the amendment of Mr. MADISON, the latter in that of Mr. HILLHOUSE.

Mr. VANS MURRAY considered the dispute as resting on the words a policy and your policy. He would not give explicit approbation to particular measures, but he approved the general principles on which the President preferred a pacific system. Mr. GILES.—It is admitted on all sides of the House, that we approve the general principles, but will not pledge ourselves to approve the particular means. It is best, then, to adopt the least equivocal words. Mr. G. allowed that there was but little difference, yet he should vote for the amendment of Mr. MADISON as it stood.

Mr. DEXTER, in opposition to the sentiments of the gentleman who had last sat down, would vote for "your policy," instead of "a policy." The latter made the sentence an abstract proposition. The words "your policy," made it a personal application. The omission of the word your tended to an implication of censure. If an abstract proposition was the whole meaning intended to be expressed, that meaning might as well be put into any other place as into an Address to the President. He did not see the use of it. Praise, (said Mr. D.,) is the only reward which a person receives in a Republican Government; or at least it is the greatest reward; and if withheld where due, the effect must be pernicious. Here it would be of more particular impropriety to withhold praise, when all our constituents approve the pacific policy of the President. It would have been a matter of little consequence at first, whether "a policy" or "your policy" had been adopted, for every reader would have understood it is an approbation of the President. But now, after such a debate, if we scruple at the word your, all the world will conclude that we mean an implied censure.

Mr. BORDEN said that he adopted the word your as unequivocal. He had no meaning but what was open and candid. By adopting the amendment the House would make that language explicit, which was at present, at least, in some degree, ambiguous.

Mr. TRACY pronounced an elegant panegyric on the character and conduct of the President or the UNITED STATES, whom no man admired more sincerely than he did, though he could not speak thus from the honor of enjoying a personal acquaintance. He recommended to Mr. MADISON rather to withdraw his motion of amendment altogether than bring it forward at such an expense of the good temper of the House. The present session had commenced with good auspices, and much cordiality, and he would be extremely sorry to disturb its tranquility.

Mr. MADISON said that he felt sensibly the force of the remarks made by the gentleman who was last up. In consequence of these remarks, he should be happy to withdraw his amendment. This was accordingly done.

It was then proposed that the Committee of the Whole House should rise, and report the draft of the Address as originally given in by the special committee, with the additional amendment that had been proposed by Mr. DAVIES, and adopted.

Mr. FIRMAMORE then rose and said, that it would seem somewhat incongruous for the House to present an Address to the President which omitted all notice of so very important an article in his Speech as that referring to the self-created societies. Mr. F. then read an amendment, which gave rise to a very interesting debate. The amendment was in these words:

"As part of this subject, we cannot withhold our reprobation of the self-created societies, which have risen up in some parts of the Union, misrepresenting the conduct of the Government, and disturbing the operation of the laws, and which, by deceiving and inflaming the ignorant and the weak, may naturally be supposed to have stimulated and urged the insurrection."

These are "institutions, not strictly unlawful, yet not less fatal to good order and true liberty; and reprehensible in the degree that our system of government approaches to perfect political freedom."

Mr. GILES stated at large his sentiments as to this expression in the Speech of the President about self-created societies. The tone of that passage in the Speech had made a great deal of noise without doors, and it was likely to produce a considerable agitation within doors. [Here a motion was made for the rising of the Committee.] Mr. G. did not wish to press himself upon the attention of the Committee, but if they were disposed to hear him, he was prepared to proceed.

Mr. SNOWICK objected to the rising of the Committee. The House had been often entertained and informed by the ingenuity of that gentleman, who was now prepared to address them.

Mr. W. SMITH considered it as opposite to the practice of the House for a member to move that a Committee should rise, at the very time when gentlemen had declared themselves ready to deliver their sentiments.

[It was repeatedly inquired from the Chair, by whom this motion was made. No answer was given; and it seemed to be the unanimous wish of the House that Mr. GILES should proceed, which he did.] Mr. G. began by declaring that, when he saw, or thought he saw, the House of Representatives about to erect itself into an office of censorship, he could not sit silent. He did not rise with the hope of making proselytes, but he trusted that the fiat of no person in America should ever be taken for truth, implicitly, and without evidence.

Mr. GILES next entered into an encomium of some length on the public services and personal character of the President. He vindicated himself from any want of respect or esteem towards him. He then entered into an examination of the propriety of the expression employed by the President, with regard to self-created societies. Mr. G. said, that there was not an individual in America, who might not come under the charge of being a member of some one or other self-created society. Associations of this kind, religious, political, and philosophical, were to be found in every quarter of the Continent. The Baptists and Methodists, for example, might be termed self-created societies. The people called the Friends, were of the same kind. Every pulpit in the United States might be included in this vote of censure, since, from every one of them, upon occasion, instructions had been delivered, not only for the eternal welfare, but likewise for the temporal happiness of the people. There had been other societies in Pennsylvania for several purposes. The venerable Franklin had been at the head of one, entitled a society for political information. They had criminated the conduct of the Governor of this State and of the Governors of other States, yet they were not prosecuted or disturbed. There was, if he mistook not, once a society in this State, for the purpose of opposing or subverting the existing Constitution. They also were unmolested. If the House are to censure the Democratic societies, they might do the same by the Cincinnati Society. It is out of the way of the Legislature to attempt checking or restraining public opinion. If the self-created societies act contrary to law, they are unprotected, and let the law pursue them. That a man is a member of one of these societies will not protect him from an accusation for treason, if the charge is well founded. If the charge is not well founded, if the societies, in their proceedings, keep within the verge of the law, Mr. G. would be glad to learn what was to be the sequel? If the House undertake to censure particular classes of men, who can tell where they will stop? Perhaps it may be advisable to commence moral philosophers, and compose a new system of ethics for the citizens of America. In that case, there would be many other subjects for censure, as well as the self-created societies. Land-jobbing, for example, has been in various instances brought to such a pass, that it might be defined swindling on a broad scale. Paper money, also, would be a subject of very tolerable fertility for the censure of a moralist. Mr. G. proceeded to enumerate other particulars on this head, and again insisted on the sufficiency of the existing laws for the punishment of every existing abuse. He observed, that gentlemen were sent to this House, not for the purpose of passing indiscriminate votes of censure, but to legislate only. By adopting the amendment of Mr. FIRMAMORE, the House would only produce recrimination on the part of the societies, and raise them into much more importance than they possibly could have acquired if they had not been distinguished by a vote of censure from that House. Gentlemen were interfering with a delicate right, and they would be much wiser to let the Democratic societies alone. Did the House imagine that their censure, like the wand of a magician, would lay a spell on these people? It would be quite the contrary, and the recrimination of the societies would develop the propriety of having meddled with them at all. One thing ought never to be forgotten, that if these people acted wrong, the law was open to punish them; and if they did not, they would care very little for a vote of that House. Why all this particular deviation from the common line of business to pass random votes of censure? The American mind was too enlightened to bear the interposition of this House, to assist either in their contemplations or conclusions on this subject. Members are not sent here to deal out applause or censures in this way. Mr. G. rejected all aiming at a restraint on the opinions of private persons. As to the societies themselves, Mr. G. personally had nothing to do with them, nor was he acquainted with any of the persons concerned in their original organization.

Mr. LYMAN hoped that the member from Pennsylvania would, upon reflection, withdraw his amendment. Mr. L. considered it to be as improper to pass a vote of censure, as it would be to give printers an opportunity of publishing debates that had better be suppressed. Besides, where will this business of censorship end? It would be much better not to meddle with the Democratic societies at all. Some of them were perfectly sensible that they had gone too far. He should, therefore, move that this Committee do now rise, and that the Chairman report the Address as it now stands.

Mr. THATCHER hoped that his colleague would not insist on taking that question just now, before other gentlemen had an opportunity of delivering their sentiments.

Mr. LYMAN in reply, said that gentlemen were at liberty, in discussing his motion, to tell their minds as to the self-created societies.

Mr. SNOWICK requested that Mr. LYMAN would take the motion out of the way. Mr. L. withdrew it.

Mr. W. SMITH then rose and entered at large into the subject. He said, that if the Committee withheld an expression of their sentiments in regard to the societies pointed out by the President, their silence would be an avowed desertion of the Executive. He had no scruple to declare that the conduct of these people had tended to blow up the insurrection. Adverting to Mr. GILES, he thought the assertion of that gentleman too broad, when he spoke of not meddling with the opinions of other than political societies.

He considered the dissemination of improper sentiments as a suitable object for the public reprobation of that House. Suppose an agricultural society were to establish itself, and under that title to disseminate opinions subversive of good order; the difference of a name should not make Mr. S. think them exempted from becoming objects of justice. Would any man say that the sole object of self-created societies has been the publication of political doctrines? The whole of their proceedings has been a chain of censures on the conduct of Government. If we do not support the President, the silence of the House will be interpreted into an implied disapprobation of that part of his Speech. He will be left in a dilemma. It will be said that he has committed himself.

Mr. S. declared that he was a friend to the freedom of the press; but would any one compare a regular town meeting where deliberations were cool and untroubled, to these societies to the nocturnal meetings of individuals, after they have dined, where they shut their doors, pass votes in secret, and admit no members into their societies, but those of their own choosing? Mr. S., by way of illustration, observed, that this House had never done much business after dinner. In objection to this amendment it had been stated, that the self-created societies would acquire importance from a vote of censure passed on them. They were, for his part, welcome to the whole importance that such a vote could give them. He complained in strong terms, of the calumnies and slanders which they had propagated against Government. Every gentleman who thought that these clubs had done mischief, was by this amendment called upon to avow his opinion. This was the whole. Mr. S. begged the House to take notice, and he repeated his words once or twice, that he did not mean to go into the constitution of these societies, or to say that they were illegal. The question before the House was not whether these societies were illegal or not, but whether they have been mischievous in their consequences.

Mr. McDOWELL was of opinion that the term self-created societies, was too indefinite. He professed the highest respect for the character of the President; but he did not think that the proposed vote of censure would be any eligible proof of it. The House of Representatives were assembled not to volunteer in passing votes of reprobation on societies or individuals, but to legislate. He wished that gentlemen, instead of losing their time on such frivolous and inflammatory amendments, would proceed to the proper business of the House. The gentleman from South Carolina seemed to be very true that they had published resolutions reprobating the Assumption business, and the system of Funding; but the rest of the people, as well as Democratic societies, had very generally censured the Assumption and the Funding transactions. He thought that some laws had been passed which answered no good purpose, nor indeed any purpose, but that of irritating the public. The present amendment, he considered as destructive not only to the intercourse of domestic society, but that it involved a prospect of throwing restraint upon the conduct of gentlemen in the House of Representatives. With the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GILES] he was satisfied that the amendment, if adopted, would have no weight whatever with the citizens of the United States; as they were too enlightened to accept of opinions from their Representatives.

Mr. TRACY had imagined that no man would have the hardihood to come forward in that House and vindicate these societies. He quoted from the remarks of Mr. McDOWELL, the words, "your wanton laws, begotten in darkness, first raised insurrection," and likewise some other words about the enormous expense of millions for the Western expedition. Mr. T., after reading these expressions from a memorandum, which he held in his hand, declared his surprise, that a gentleman, whom he knew to possess the candor and good sense of the member from North Carolina, could suffer such language to escape him. He was certain that the gentleman, if he had not been somewhat in a hurry, never would have permitted these words to pass from his lips.

Quitting this topic, Mr. T. said, that he would for his own part, be disposed to let these societies alone, and leave them to the chastisement of their own consciences. If they were to say, "Gentlemen, you, as tyrants, make laws, and slaves obey them," I would answer, said Mr. T., "It is very rash. Think again, before you say this again. We believe that, from inadvertency, some things have escaped from Democratic societies, which they had not well weighed, and which had a bad effect on weak and ignorant people in the Western counties of Pennsylvania. You have seen the bad effects of your temerity. Take care before you publish any such thing again." Mr. T. said, this is all the length which we mean to go, and can anybody object to this? The Democratic societies form but a very small portion of the people of America. Where is the harm in saying that one hundredth, or I believe I might say, not more than one thousandth part of the citizens of the United States have been mistaken, and that they have been imprudent in printing certain indiscreet resolutions? Mr. T. declared that if the President had not spoke of the matter, he should have been willing to let it alone, because whenever a subject of that kind was touched, there were certain gentlemen in that House who shook their backs, like a sore-backed horse, and cried out The Liberties of the People! Mr. T. wished only that the House, if their opinions of these societies corresponded with that of the President, should declare that they had such an opinion. This was quite different from attempting to legislate on the subject. Has not the Legislature done so before? Is there any impropriety in paying this mark of respect to a man, to whom all America owes such indelible obligations. He thought that this declaration from the House of Representatives would tend to discourage Democratic Societies, by uniting all men of sense against them. Mr. T. said, that perhaps the member who spoke last, might be connected with some of these societies, of which he entertained so favorable an impression.

Mr. McDowell said, that he wanted the House to avoid quarrels, and to mind their proper business of legislation. He declared that he was not a member of any such society. He did not know that he had ever been in the company of any person who was a member of any of them. He was even, he declared upon his honor, ignorant whether there were, or ever had been, any such societies there were, or ever had been, any such societies in North Carolina. He adverted to the simile of the sore-backed horse, and said, that he believed his back to have been rubbed harder in the last war, than that of the gentleman. He imagined that these societies had done both good and harm, and again declared, that he could not consent to a vote of indiscriminate reprobation.

them the very worst advocates for the cause which they espoused; but he had come two hundred miles to legislate, and not to reprobate private societies. He was not paid by his constituents for doing business of that sort. The President knew the business of the House better than to call for any such votes of censure. It was wrong to condemn societies for particular acts. That there never should be a Democratic society in America, said Mr. N., I would give my most hearty consent; but I cannot agree to persecution for the sake of opinions. With respect either to the propriety or the power of suppressing them, Mr. N. was in both cases equally of opinion that it was much better to let them alone. They must stand or fall by the general sentiments of the people of America. Is it possible that these societies can exist, for any length of time, when they are of no real use to the country? No. But this amendment will make the people at large imagine that they are of consequence.

Mr. Davron said, that these societies had produced the Western insurrection, and, therefore, the Committee were just as well entitled to institute an inquiry in this case, as formerly, regarding the failure of the expedition of General St. Clair. The Committee now rose, and reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, November 25.

Another member, to wit: JAMES GILLESPIE, from North Carolina, appeared, and took his seat in the House. Mr. MURRAY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to authorize the President to call out and station a corps of militia in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania, for a limited time; which was read twice, and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill extending the privilege of franking to JAMES WHITE, the Delegate from the Southwestern Territory, and making provision for his compensation; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported an amendment, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendment, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Resolved, That the President of the UNITED STATES be requested to direct the proper officer to state to this House the difficulties and inconveniences which have occurred in the execution of the act entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence, by establishing a uniform Militia throughout the United States."

Ordered, That Mr. MOORE and Mr. GORDON be appointed a committee to wait on the President with the foregoing resolution.

The following Message was received from the President of the UNITED STATES: Gentlemen of the Senate, and

I lay before you a statement of the troops in the service of the United States, which has been submitted to me by the Secretary of War. It will rest with Congress to consider and determine whether further inducements shall be held out for entering into the military service of the United States, in order to complete the establishment authorized by law.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, November 25, 1794.

The said Message and statement were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH

The House went again into Committee of the Whole on the Address to the President and the amendment of Mr. Fitzsimons—Mr. CONN in the Chair.

Mr. MURRAY said, that he did not altogether like the wording of the amendment now before the House. He had hoped that some modification of it would have been prepared by some of its friends; but as none was offered, and there was a call for the question, he would vote for it rather than against it. He said, that he had not been personally attacked by any of the tribunals in question, and no further injured by their machinations than as he was a citizen of a free Republic, in whose prosperity he felt the closest possible union, and in whose calamities he of course felt great sympathy. Among the various sources of the late calamity, the President had traced and designated certain self-created societies, who had arrogated the management of public opinions and affairs, and whom he had declared to have been, in his opinion, instrumental in fomenting the late insurrection. Mr. M. confessed that he had feared, last winter, lest the disorganizing spirit which had gone abroad in the shape of resolutions from these societies, would have produced the effect ascribed to them by the President. The conduct of the Democratic clubs, or those of them with which he had most acquaintance, appeared to him to have been instrumental to an event which threatened destruction to legitimate Government. If we believe this to be the case, Mr. M. knew no motive, duty, or policy, which ought to restrain us at this period from saying that we will rather hold out a caution to the thoughtless, than inflict legal penalties upon their follies. It will present to our fellow-citizens a memorable example of one source of error and political misfortune, by showing them the danger, which has already cost above twelve hundred thousand dollars. He could not see any evil that was to result from an expression of the opinion of the House, by the proposed amendment. It had not the quality of law; for, if a law were proposed for the abolition of these societies, he would oppose it. This amendment to the Address would operate as an advice. It curtails not the right of a free press, which Mr. M. held to be the luminary of the public mind. It would tend to excite a judicious and salutary inquiry among many respecting the just and true limits within which a virtuous and enlightened well-wisher to our country would think it safe to exercise this right. Of the inutilty and danger of such societies in this country, he had little doubt. The scene of their birth-place was well adapted to the wholesome display of their powers. In France, where a Despotism, impregnable to public opinion, had reigned—where no channel opened a sympathy by Representation with the great body of the nation—those societies were admirably adapted to break down and subvert the old bulwark of habitual authority. But in America the case was widely different. Look at the immense body of public functionaries, who in this country are elected immediately by the people, or by their electors, in a Constitutional mode, and say whether they are not adequate as functionaries to the public purposes of the country. Including every description of Legislators, Councils, Governors, Courts, Jurors, and Sheriffs, there are above twelve thousand. Of these, more than eleven hundred are actual Legislators, besides the hundred in this House, and those above stairs. These all act in the States, counties, townships, and hundreds, in separate but relative circles, so as to preclude a partial attention to any one scene, to the exclusion of another. The whole country is full of well-constituted organs of the People's will. Many of these Legislatures are in session twice a year, and all of them annually. We might be confused by their immense number, were they not so admirably dispersed over the Continent, and did they not move under the guidance of the laws, with the harmony of the spheres. It would not be easy to organize the nation into a more multifarious shape.

The case maintained by Mr. DAYTON yesterday appeared to be strong. He said that we had inquired into the defeat of St. Clair's Army, and so we might into the causes of the insurrection. To point it out to a people so enlightened, will be to prevent it in future. If the House agree in opinion with the President, they will speak their opinion, and do their duty. This declaration goes to the constituent body, through the Executive; and, while it gratifies their inquiry in a point of so much solicitude, it erects a warning beacon. It shows to them the stormy breakers which lately threatened the public peace with shipwreck, and invites them to adhere to pilots of their own choosing, and to charts with which they are acquainted.

If the President had not thought some of the societies instrumental in producing the late calamity, they would not have attracted his notice, nor that of the House. It is because they are believed to have assisted and fomented the insurrection, that our constituents ought to be warned against them; and that another necessity for exerting their patriotism may be saved to those brave men who are at present encountering every difficulty in the West. These societies are not attended to, because, however offensive some of their proceedings and doctrines may have been, yet the rights of the press ought not to be freely handled.

Mr. FITZSIMONS had no violent predilection for any performance of his own. He had, therefore, to prevent so much disputing, prepared to withdraw his motion, provided the Committee be willing that he should do so, and, in the room of this motion, he would read another, for which he was indebted to a gentleman at his right hand, [Mr. B. BOUTWELL.]

The Committee consented. The former motion was withdrawn, and the other was read. This was an echo of that part of the Speech of the President which mentions self-created societies.

Mr. CHRISTIE then rose. He was sorry to differ from his worthy colleague, [Mr. MURRAY,] on the question then before the Committee; and he was doubly sorry to hear that gentleman labor so strenuously to saddle a public odium on some of the best citizens of the State which he represented. Mr. C. should not have risen on the present occasion, although he thought it an important one, had it not been to endeavor to rescue from public censure a society of gentlemen, who were described in the present amendment before the Committee, as objects of public approbrium. Mr. C. alluded to the Republican Society of the town of Baltimore. If the present amendment took place, that society would be involved in general and undeserved censure. He would, therefore, inform the House of what description of men the Republican Society of Baltimore consisted; and then the Committee would be the best judges in which they ought to be rewarded in the manner in which the present amendment proposes. They are a society of gentlemen associated together for the purpose of diffusing political knowledge throughout the State of Maryland, and to instruct their Representatives in Congress, and the Legislature of the State, in any point that they think necessary, and not for the purpose of sowing dissension among the citizens of America, or of cultivating dislike to the Union, or to the laws. This society consists of men whose characters are superior to any censure that might be thrown against them, by the mover of the amendment. But when Congress are about to cast an odium on a particular society, the members of which have every respect for that body, and have always inculcated obedience to the laws of the United States, Mr. C. left it to the Committee to determine whether, if they were themselves in the place of the Baltimore Society, they would not feel their sensibility materially wounded? Was not this returning good for evil? He again reminded the Committee, that the Republican Society at Baltimore was composed of a band of patriots, not the fair-weather patriots of the present day, but the patriots of seventy-five, the men who were not afraid to rally around the American standard, when that station was almost concluded to be a forlorn hope. They were men who, with their persons and properties, had assisted to drive from the soil of America the present lawless disturbers of the world. Are those the men, asked Mr. C., who ought to have all this mass of Congressional odium cast upon them? I trust not, sir. I trust, that if particular gentlemen are illiberal enough to censure them, yet that this House will never agree to such iniquitous measures. What was the conduct of this society when the first news of the late insurrection reached them? Did they not, in the most pointed manner, discountenance any such proceeding? Did they not refuse to correspond with any society that aided, or in any manner abetted, the insurrection? They did more. They offered their personal services to go and help to crush this commotion in the bud. Mr. C. subjoined that he would venture to say, and at the same time he spoke within bounds, that nine-tenths of this society actually took up their muskets and marched into the field, for the above laudable purpose, and that numbers of them still continue there, and are the friends of peace and order, and not the disorganizers that the present amendment would make them. Mr. C. appealed to the candor of the Committee to say, whether the Baltimore self-created Republican Society were the description of men whom the President, in his Speech, meant to describe. He was sure it was not. Therefore, why involve in this indiscriminate censure men who have deserved as well of their country? men who, instead of having odium cast upon them, merit every praise which the Federal Government can bestow. For these, and some other reasons, Mr. C. declared that he should vote against the amendment, and he trusted that he should vote in the majority.

Mr. MURRAY rose to explain. He did not mean this Society. It was the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh societies. Mr. M. was acquainted with this society, and had the greatest respect for them. As for the members of the other societies, he was for gibbering their principles only.

Mr. RUTHERFORD.—This alarm is owing to an overgrown moneyed system, with which the people are not entirely satisfied. But the money-holders need not be afraid. The people will pay the public debt. Then why disturb the tranquility of the people? The President, in his Speech, points only at combinations over the mountains. As to the character of the President himself, to praise him was like holding up a rush candle to let us see the sun. I have known that man, said Mr. R., for these forty years. I have had the honor of serving under him in the last war, and of frequently executing his wise and noble orders. The member declared that this amendment could answer no purpose but that of disturbing the public peace. He himself represented as respectable a district as any in Virginia, and he had as good opportunities as any gentleman in that House to know the temper of Americans. They were firmly attached to the present Government, and the holders of paper need not be so much afraid of Democratic societies, for the people, to preserve the tranquility, were determined to discharge the public debt, no matter how it was contracted, and, therefore, it would be much better not to harass the public mind with amendments like that on the table.

Mr. GILES said, that he had an amendment to propose that would, he hoped, meet with the approbation of a certain description of gentlemen in that Committee. His amendment was to strike out the words "self-created societies," from the amendment of Mr. FITZSIMONS, and insert "the Democratic societies of Philadelphia, New York, and Pittsburgh." Gentlemen could then have some specific object at which they could say that their vote of censure was levelled; for the general expression of self-created, comprehended every society of any kind in the Union. For his own part, he was very far from wanting to censure any set of men for their political opinions.

Mr. PARKER seconded the motion for striking out, but he would not consent to the insertion proposed by Mr. GILES.

Mr. SEDGWICK thought that the amendment stands better as it is at present.

Mr. VENABLE said, that there was a paper on that table, (he referred to the letter from Mr. HAMILTON to the President,) which showed that the combinations in the western counties began their existence at the very same time with the Excise law itself. It was, therefore, entirely improper to ascribe them to Democratic societies. Should Government, said Mr. V., come forward and show their imbecility by censuring what we cannot punish? The people have a right to think and a right to speak. I am not afraid to speak my sentiments. I am not afraid of being called a disorganizer. I am, as much as any gentleman in this Committee, a friend to regular government.

Mr. DEXTER believed that such societies were, in themselves, wrong, but he was still not for making laws against them. He had, however, numerous objections to their conduct. One of these was, that they erected themselves into a model for the rest of their fellow-citizens to copy. The great principle of Republicanism was, that the minority should submit to the will of the majority. But these people have elevated themselves into tyrants. Such societies are proper in a country where Government is despotic, but it is improper that such societies should exist in a free country like the United States, and hence Mr. D. was a friend to the amendment proposed by Mr. FITZSIMONS. It had been said, that it was unusual to give opinions of this kind, but, in reality the House were in the practice of expressing their sentiments on matters of that sort, in such addresses as the one now before them. Mr. D. was decidedly against the amendment of the amendment proposed by Mr. GILES.

Mr. NICHOLAS.—Gentlemen have brought us into a discussion, and then say we must decide as they please, in deference to the President. This is the real ground and foundation of their arguments. But who started this question? If the gentlemen have brought themselves into a difficulty with regard to the President, by their participation in proposing votes of censure, which they cannot carry through, they have only to blame themselves. Is it expected, said Mr. N., that I am to abandon my independence for the sake of the President? He never intended that we should take any such notice of his reference to these societies; but if the popularity of the President has, in the present case, been committed, let those who have latched this thing, and who have brought it forward, answer for the consequences. This whole question turns upon a matter of fact, which ought to be proved; viz: Have the Democratic societies been one of the principal causes of the Western insurrection? This is a matter of fact, or otherwise, and it depends upon direct evidence. But, how do gentlemen handle this question? They digress into abstract propositions, a thing never heard of before, where a matter of fact was to be proved. I say, where direct proof is wanted, we see gentlemen standing on the floor for half an hour together, without attempting to advance a single fact in support of their assertions; yet this is the only admissible kind of evidence that the societies are from their nature unfriendly to the Federal Government.

President's Speech.

Mr. N. then adverted to a remark which had been made, that libels were daily prosecuted in this country, from which it was inferred that censorious attacks on Government were the just objects of repression. Mr. N. said, that the comparison was not fair, because in a case of libel, the parties accused have a proper opportunity to defend themselves. Have these people here, (the Democratic societies) any such opportunity? It has been alleged, as a crime against them, that they have never once published any approbation of any measure of Government. Mr. N. argued that this arose from the very nature of their institution, which was to watch the errors of the Legislature and Executive, and point out to the public what they considered to be mistakes. Faults were the only kind of facts which they were in quest of. Here Mr. N. drew a material distinction. If these societies had censured every proceeding of Government, there would have been the greatest reason for taking some measures. But what was the case? As to an immense number of the proceedings of the Executive and Legislature, they had taken no notice whatever.

Mr. SENGWICK thought that the PRESIDENT would have been defective in his duty, had he omitted to mention what he religiously believed to be true, viz: that the Democratic societies had in a great measure originated the late disturbances. It was the indispensable duty of the PRESIDENT to speak as he had spoken. The present amendment, [of Mr. FITZSIMONS] would have a tendency to plunge these societies into contempt, and to sink them still further into abhorrence and detestation. He pronounced them to be ill-just combinations. One gentleman [Mr. NICHOLAS] tells you, that he despises them most heartily. Another [Mr. LYNAMAN] says that they begin to repent. Will the American people perversely propose to shoulder and bolster up these despised and repenting societies, which are now tumbling into dust and contempt? Their conduct differed as far from a fair and honorable investigation, as Christ and Belial. They were men prowling in the dark. God is my judge, said Mr. S. that I would not wish to check a fair discussion.

One gentleman [Mr. McDOWELL] had told the Committee, that the Assumption and Funding transactions were a cause of public discontent. It has been the trick of these people to make this assertion. They have said that the Funding System is a mass of favoritism, for the purpose of erecting an oppressive aristocracy, and a paper nobility. There is not a man among them, who is able to write, and who does not know that these assertions are false. As to the assumption of the debts of individual States, it has been said that this measure was undertaken for the purpose of making up a large debt. There was no such thing. Before the adoption of the new Constitution, of which Mr. S. considered the Funding and Assumption Systems to be essential preliminaries, the credit and commerce of America were declining or gone. The States were disagreeing at home, and the American name was disgraced abroad. It was not to be supposed that every one of the measures of the new Government could please every body. Among the rest, excise was objected to in both Houses of Congress; but at last the good sense of the people acquiesced. At this crisis, a foreign agent (Genet) landed at Charleston. On his way to this city, he was attended by the hosannas of all the disaffected. He did the utmost mischief that was in his power; and in consequence of his efforts, Democratic societies sprung up. Mr. S. here gave a particular account of some proceedings of a society in Virginia, of more than usual boldness. He quoted some of their expressions relative to a very illustrious character, the PRESIDENT, and added that perhaps the individuals who composed this society were in themselves too despicable to deserve any notice in this place. He did not know whether they were or not. [Mr. S. was here interrupted by a member from Virginia, and an explanation ensued.]

He then returned to the subject of excise. He said that it was to be noticed, and he proclaimed it here, that antecedent to the Democratic societies making their appearance, the flame of discontent seemed smothered. But these men told the people that they would be slaves. Was not this wrong? They should have told what was well done as well as ill done. From Portland, in Maine, to the other end of the Continent, have they ever approved of one single act? They have scrutinized with eagle eyes into every fault. Whom are we to trust, them, or the man that, more than any other human man, ever did, possesses the affection of a whole people? The question is, shall we support the Constitution or not?

Mr. McDOWELL rose to make an apology for some words which had escaped him the day before. He did not expect to have been so smartly handled. He had been forcibly struck at the time, and had spoken from a momentary impulse. In substance, however, he adhered to all his former allegations. He still persisted in believing that the excise laws were shapen in darkness. He apologized for some part of his heat, from having seen and suffered so much by despotic Government during the last war in which this gentleman supported the character of a brave and able officer.

Mr. HILLHOUSE approved of the amendment as proposed by Mr. FITZSIMONS. Constituents made no scruple to tell Representatives of their faults, and he saw no reason why Representatives might not tell constituents of theirs? The resolutions of Democratic societies printed in newspapers, had spirited up the people in the Western counties to resistance. They had weakly fancied that the American nation would not stand by their Constitution and their PRESIDENT. But for the publication of these resolutions, there would have been no insurrection. This was a piece of information which the people of the United States had a right to know. It was the duty of that House to let them know it. The PRESIDENT had done his duty. Mr. H. did not consider the amendment of Mr. FITZSIMONS as an indiscriminate censure levelled at these societies; he thought it only a suitable answer to a part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech.

Mr. PARKER concluded this long debate by the following remarks. He did not think that Democratic societies were so far to blame as had been imagined. He suspected that the PRESIDENT himself, for whose character and services he felt as much respect and gratitude as any man in America, had been misinformed on this point. It would be absurd to say, that the Western disturbances originated from the publications of Democratic societies, if it could be proved to the satisfaction of the committee, that such disturbances had begun, long before any of the associations alluded to had a being. To prove this position, Mr. P. desired that the Clerk might read a passage from the letter on that affair, written by Mr. Hamilton, and which has already been published in all the newspapers. The Clerk accordingly read a part of the letter, from which Mr. P. inferred that his inference was incontestable, and he then stated the absurdity of making the Democratic publications the origin of a discontent which existed before them. He was satisfied that the PRESIDENT did not wish this thing echoed; and that he would entirely disprove of the proposed persecution. Mr. P. said, that he had the honor of being an honorary member of a Democratic society. Personally he knew nothing of the gentlemen, but he understood that they were respectable characters; and that they were friends to good order and the Federal Government, there could be no question, for when the Embargo was laid last spring, and some vessels had been attempting to get off, these vigilant citizens armed and embodied themselves and prevented the execution of the design. With all his respect for the PRESIDENT, he was not to give up his opinions for the sake of any man. He was convinced that all this violent declamation and irritation in the House would do a great deal of mischief, and would have an effect exactly the reverse of what was designed by the amendment as it first stood. A gentleman [Mr. DEXTER] had spoken of town meetings, as the proper vehicles for the communication of political ideas, and had drawn a comparison between these and Democratic societies. Mr. P. requested that it might be noticed, that in the Southern States there neither were nor could be such things as town meetings, because the population was too thin and too widely scattered. They were, therefore, to make the best of it which they could, and meet and deliberate, no matter where, whenever they found a convenient opportunity. Mr. P. expressed, in strong terms, the aversion that his constituents would feel to this species of censorship. He concluded with these words: "They love your Government much, but they love their independence more." The question was then called for on striking out the word, "self-created" from the new amendment of Mr. FITZSIMONS. For the amendment of Mr. GILES, ayes 47, noes 46. This amendment was, therefore, adopted.

Mr. GILES then proposed an amendment, after the words, "combinations of men," by adding, "in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania." Mr. HARTLEY said, that the gentleman should have added, "and a county in Virginia." This amendment of Mr. GILES was rejected.

The Committee now rose and reported the amendments to the House.

WEDNESDAY, November 26.

An engrossed bill, extending the privilege of franking to JAMES WHITE, the Delegate from the Southwestern Territory, and making provision for his compensation, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter, signed Oliver Wolcott, jr., on behalf of the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied with estimates of the sums necessary to be appropriated for the service of the year 1795; also statements of the application of certain sums of money granted by law; which were read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

A motion was made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to increase the pay, and regulate the other allowances hereafter to be given to non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the troops on the Military Establishment of the United States, and of the Militia, when called into actual service, and to ascertain the time when the pay of the Militia shall, in future, commence; and to make further and more ample provision for the pay of the Militia on the present expedition to Fort Pitt."

Ordered, That the said motion be referred to the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the better organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia of the United States.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the PRESIDENT to call out and station a corps of militia in the four western counties of Pennsylvania, for a limited time; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was referred the Address to the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses.

The SPEAKER read that amendment, in which the words self-created societies had been yesterday expunged, after a long debate, and upon the motion of Mr. GILES, from an amendment of Mr. FITZSIMONS.

A pause of a few minutes ensued. At last Mr. DARTON rose and said, that if nobody else would make the motion he should make it, for replacing the words self-created societies and in the amendment to the Address.

Mr. RUTHERFORD declared that he would oppose these words to the last. If the Democratic societies spoke nonsense, people would despise them. If they spoke otherwise, the people would esteem them, in defiance of any vote of censure of that House. The people do not look on them with a great deal of reverence, but still they wish to hear them. By the turn which the debate has now taken, if any man is in favor of these societies, the President is drawn across his face. All the jealousies with regard to the attachment of the people are mere nonsense. In the district which Mr. R. represents, there was not a single Democratic society. But these societies contain many valuable and excellent characters. It answers no purpose, then, to pass votes of this kind. Perhaps Democratic societies have sometimes done wrong, but this was not a proper foundation for condemning them in whole. Every Government under Heaven hath a tendency to degenerate into tyranny. Let the people then speak out. Why not let them speak out? What occasion is there for all this alarm among the stockholders? A man falls from his horse, and, while stunned by the blow, he says to his neighbor, is not the universe fallen? Just so the paper-holders have got a small alarm about their stock on account of this war, and in their fright imagine that the Continent is ready for an insurrection. He repeatedly observed, in the course of his remarks, that the country was in a state of the greatest prosperity and tranquility, if gentlemen would not rouse them with the present idle motion, from which he boded no good consequence. He repeatedly affirmed that all was well.

Mr. DARTON inquired whether all could be well, when it had been requisite to raise an army of fifteen thousand men to quell a rebellion? Was it a mark of that universal tranquility and satisfaction of which the gentleman spoke, that an hundred and fifty men were now prisoners, and about to be tried for high treason? Could all be well in a country from whence large bodies of men had lately fled in a state of rebellion? He understood that the Democratic societies had been given up by all the members, as at any rate contemptible and useless, if not pernicious.

Mr. GILES declared that he felt his situation extremely delicate. On one hand it was highly painful to differ from the gentlemen on the other side of the question. It was likewise extremely disagreeable to be engaged in saying anything that might seem to thwart the sentiments of the President, or imply any want of deference or politeness for so eminent a character. He had endeavored to show that the President really never wanted or wished for any echo of this nature, and he was still convinced that such was the fact. He was desirous for conciliation, but he never could attempt to purchase it, by an abandonment of opinion, without conviction that he was wrong. He now saw evidently that conciliation could not be obtained. He had done everything in his power to obtain the best information. He had listened attentively to all sides, and if conviction had come home to his mind, he would have announced the alteration of his sentiments. There was one circumstance in particular which persuaded him that the arguments employed on the opposite side were erroneous, which was, that gentlemen, who on other topics had been clear and logical, could not, on this subject, bring themselves after hearing so many eloquent harangues for two days past, he could not suspect them for any want of natural ingenuity. One member, [Mr. MURRAY,] had inveighed against all societies, but when pushed hard, he excepted the Republican Society of Baltimore. A gentleman from Massachusetts had included them all in one general sweep of reprobation. [Here Mr. DARTON rose, and inquired if Mr. GILES meant him. Mr. SNOWICK was the gentleman referred to, and he explained that all the societies of this sort which he ever heard of had done mischief; and as to the Baltimore Republican Society, he learned yesterday for the first time, that such a body had an existence. Further about them he could not say.] After this interruption, Mr. GILES reverted to an examination of what had fallen from Mr. MURRAY. That gentleman had declared that he would dress the press. [Here Mr. MURRAY stopped Mr. GILES by denying that he ever said any such thing.] Mr. GILES declared that he was sorry if he had misquoted him. He should be happy to be interrupted by any member whom he might happen to misquote. He was glad to be set right. Mr. MURRAY then repeated the words which he had used, or rather part of them. Mr. M. said, that he was sorry for having expressed himself in such a way as to be liable to be misinterpreted, but sometimes it was difficult to avoid an ambiguity or incompleteness of expression. [In the notes of the reporter of the sketch of yesterday, the whole sentence as pronounced by Mr. MURRAY, stands as follows: "The rights of the press ought not to be freely handled. The probe that would reach the bottom of the sore, might give a spasm to the finest nerve in the organs of freedom. We may point out the sore to our constituents, and though it might be an empiricism to cut it out, we may give it an emollient dressing, and trust to the soundness of the National Constitution, and the regimen of reflection for the cure." We have here inserted this passage of Mr. MURRAY's speech of yesterday, in justice to that gentleman, because it seemed evident this day, that he himself could not distinctly recollect it; and on this passage it was that Mr. GILES founded his affirmation that Mr. MURRAY wanted to dress the press.]

Mr. GILES proceeded to draw a parallel between what is now endeavored to be done in the House of Representatives, and what has lately been done in France. When once the business of denunciation begins, nobody can tell where it will end. Robespierre, its great progenitor, has been its victim, and who can tell what kind of retorts may be attempted in America. The idea is not new; and has always, in the end, led to the destruction of the parties who were its authors. Mr. G. then adverted to the style of eloquence that has lately been introduced into this place. We have had two days of declamation. Looking at Mr. SENEZ, he said, that one would think Demosthenes and Cicero had risen from the dust, and revisited this earth to inculcate their favorite maxim of Actio! Actio! He was sorry to say, what he feared was true, that there was at least as much personal irritation, as deliberate judgment, employed on this question, and more he doubted of the former than of the latter.

The House had proposed to denounce the Democratic societies. It was impossible to see where such a business might end; perhaps the Democrats, when they got upmost, would denounce the anti-Democrats. Mr. G. said that he employed this last term, because the term of Aristocrats would, he believed, be unacceptable to every party in the Union. The present amendment founded the innocent with the guilty. Many brave men had stepped forward from these societies on the present occasion. Indeed there were no proofs that any members of these societies had been guilty. The Baltimore Republican Society were among the very first who took up arms to suppress the insurrection, and, if Mr. G. was not misinformed, many of the Philadelphia Democrats had done the same. The impropriety, therefore, of this vote of censure, would strike all America. Mr. G. remarked, that he would be very glad to know what Congress would say to any gentleman, a member of a Democratic society, who had gone to suppress the Western insurrection. He wished for leave of the Committee to personify such a man. "I am," said he, "a member of a Democratic society. I am likewise a member of a Republican society. The moment that I heard of the Western insurrection, I took up my musket as a volunteer, and marched three hundred miles to suppress the insurrection." Mr. G. could give the address, but he was altogether at a loss for what sort of answer could be made to such a gentleman. It had been said, that when people censured the House, that the House were entitled to return the compliment by censuring them. This position Mr. G. denied. No, sir, said he, the public have a right to censure us, and we have not a right to censure them. We have a title, as individuals, but when we undertake this business in the shape of a Legislative body, we are as much a self-created society, as any Democratic club in the Union. We are neither authorized by the Constitution, nor paid by the citizens of the United States, for assuming the office of censorship. Look into the Constitution. We are authorized to legislate, but will gentlemen show me a clause authorizing us to pass votes of censure, or, above all, to pass votes of censure and reprobation on our constituents? Sir, if such a clause had been inserted in the Constitution, it never would have gone through. The people never would have suffered it. Mr. G. here enlarged on the impropriety of wasting the time of the Committee and the treasure of the United States on three or four words of an Address. It was said, that this was a delicate subject. Why, then, meddle with it? We are leaving the majesty of the people behind us by this kind of trifling. Gentlemen express their attachment to the liberty of the press, and they affirm that by this vote of censure they will not encroach upon it. The distinction is extremely minute between the office of a censor and that of a legislator. It is likely that they may be very soon confounded together.

Mr. G. requested gentlemen to look at the obvious consequences of what they were doing. It had been said that this vote of censure would sink the societies—they were tumbling into dust and contempt. Why, in the newspapers of this very morning, a meeting was advertised for to-morrow night. This was the natural progress of things. Here Mr. G. explained the apparent prospect that the newspapers will presently be suffocated with columns of votes, resolutions, and epistolary lumber of all sorts. He then stated an important distinction. Many people who condemn the proceedings of the Democratic societies, yet will not choose to see them divested of the inalienable privilege of thinking, of speaking, of writing, and of printing. Persons may condemn the abuse in exercising a right, and yet feel the strongest sympathy with the right itself. Are not Muir and Palmer, and the other martyrs of Scotch despotism, toasted from one end of the Continent to the other? And why is it so? These men asserted the right of thinking, of speaking, of writing, and of printing. Yet even their treatment, shocking as it was, did not come quite up to that proposed in the Committee for the Democratic societies; for even these people had at least the semblance of a trial, but the Democratic societies have not even that. There is only one paper on the table that brings any evidence on the subject, and that paper expressly tells us that the seeds of the Western insurrection were planted by the very first introduction of the Excise law, that is to say, some years before the Democratic societies had a being. The Excise and the opposition to it began together. The Democratic societies, when they heard of the insurrection, concurred in a most explicit reprobation of it, and published their resolutions to that purpose. Mr. G. said that he himself could not be said to have an aversion to excise, for he had been a friend to the principle, and had only voted against the law itself, because it was not restricted to a limited time. Mr. G. said, that he had been an object of calumny, misrepresentation, and abuse; but this should not hinder him from proceeding in the direct line of conscious rectitude. He should always preserve that dignity of conduct, to treat abuse with silent contempt.

I have been, said Mr. G., and I still am dissatisfied with the Funding System. Its object, at first was to divide the people of the United States into two classes, debtors and creditors. Let us have the privilege of honestly paying this debt. This is the sore, and it is no wonder if the patient sometimes winces under it. Pay off the Public Debt, and I assure you that my censures of Government shall be at an end. Mr. G. said that he had felt a pain in differing from the gentlemen on the other side of the question. He quoted that passage in the Speech which has already been cited, in a former sketch of this debate, by Mr. Nicholas, and where the President addresses himself to every description of citizens. Mr. G. inferred that the President did not wish Congress to intermeddle in the business. It was not them, but the people to whom he addressed himself, and whom he wished to become censors. He was, therefore, consistent with the President; but, even had he differed from so great an authority, he enjoyed the consolation of having come forward to oppose the very first step made in America to curb public opinion. It had yesterday been alleged, as the very worst trait in the character of Democratic societies, that they began their business after dinner, bolted their doors, and voted in the dark. This was a very alarming and detestable species of conduct! Whether the accusation were true, or not, Mr. G. could not tell from personal knowledge, for he knew nothing about these societies, but from report. But, Mr. Chairman, (pointing to the roof of the room,) is there no other place where people bolt their doors, and vote in the dark? Is there not a branch of our Legislature which transacts its business in this way? And, while things are so, does it become us to censure other people for voting in the dark? We have been drawn into this thing as a point of deference and politeness to the President; and, because nothing could give Mr. G. greater pain than even an appearance of differing from the PRESIDENT, he could wish that nothing of this kind should appear upon the Journals, but that an explicit vote might be avoided by the previous question. He had wished for an accommodation, and nothing less had got on the pressing system, but gentlemen than all which they wanted would content them. No accommodation was, in their eyes, admissible. Mr. G. concluded his speech by declaring, that if he had, upon the present occasion, overstepped the bounds of his habitual calmness, he was sorry for it, and wished to apologize to the Committee; but that his warmth arose from his profound astonishment at the imprudence of agitating the present amendment. Whatever might be the style of his delivery, he had not uttered a single idea which was not produced by deliberate reflection and by honest conviction.

Mr. Boudinot thought that speakers had wandered from their proper line of argument. If any bystander had come into the House, to hear the debates of this day, without a previous knowledge of the point in dispute, it would have been impossible for him even to conjecture what question was before the Committee. It had been said, that we ought not to censure where we cannot punish.

By the same rule, we ought not to approve where we cannot reward. It was urged, that, if Democratic societies are unlawful, we ought to punish them; but, if otherwise, we ought to let them alone. Mr. B. denied this axiom. Many things were extremely deserving of censure, which it was impossible to punish. He stated, as a point in law, that if a person were to call him a rascal and a villain, an action would not lie, unless he could specify an injury suffered by this assertion. He employed as an argument against the whole opposition to the original amendment, that no societies were included in this censure but such as were guilty. Self-created societies had done such and such a thing; but the President neither said, nor intended to say, nor was it possible to misinterpret his words into an intention of saying, that all self-created societies had been partners in exciting the Western insurrection. The amendment, therefore, included nothing like an indiscriminate censure, for it was levelled only at the guilty. The whole reasoning, therefore, of the gentleman, on the opposite side of the question, was entirely out of place. Gentlemen proceeded upon an utter misapplication. It was asked, what good would follow from this vote of censure? Mr. B. foresaw substantial advantages. It would operate as a warning, both to the societies themselves and to other citizens of the United States.

Mr. Scott and Mr. Ames were both up at the same time. The latter gentleman immediately sat down. Mr. S. began by observing, that he had lived for twenty-five years in the very midst of the place (Washington county) where the insurrection broke out. He knew that there were self-created societies in that part of the country, and he likewise knew that they had inflamed the insurrection; for some of the leaders of those societies had likewise been the leaders of the riots. The Speech of the PRESIDENT, and the Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, were in every particular, strictly true. Mr. S. himself, who was in the very midst of the scene, could not have given a more candid and accurate account of it, than that of the President and Mr. HAMILTON. Whether other Democratic societies, besides those in the four Western counties had assisted in kindling the disturbances, Mr. S. could not say. Their publications we have all seen. Further, Mr. S. knew nothing, and thus far every member knew as much as himself. Before he sat down, there was one point which he anxiously pressed upon the House, and this was, that these deluded people were objects of real pity. They were, in the first place, grossly ignorant, and they had been persuaded, by an utmost diligence of situation, that the American Government was, even in theory, the very worst in the world; and next, that, in practice, it was executed much worse than any other government under the sun. Mr. S. observed, that when people had got this length in absurdity, it was not difficult to make them fight against such a Government.

Mr. Ames began with expressing his pleasure that he had sat down to give way to Mr. Scott to speak; but this every one must see was attended with a personal sacrifice: and it was manifestly a disadvantage to bring forward his observations immediately after those of that gentleman, because they were too remarkable for their pertinence, and strength to encourage the attempts of their opponents to invalidate, or his own to enforce them.

He requested Mr. GILES, and he urged it strongly on the House, to consider maturely how large a part of the argument he had to answer. Mr. GILES had been occupied in refuting what nobody had denied. It would appear to every person, at a glance, that, after so large a deduction should be made, the advocate of the amendment would be left almost without an adversary.

He observed, it would be amusing, and not without its uses, to turn a moment from the debate, to inquire what would be said of yesterday's decision. Fame already bears it on all her wings, and proclaims it with all her tongues, that Congress has been engaged in trying the Democratic clubs; and curiosity stands a tip-toe on all our Post Roads for the answer, which is already gone forth. Forty-seven members were for the clubs, and forty-five against them, so that the clubs gained the victory.

Is this true? I dare appeal, (said Mr. AMES,) to you, sir, and to every other patriotic bosom, that it is not true: a large majority, and I may even say, with pride and pleasure, almost all the members who hear me, despise and abominate the clubs as sincerely as the words of the PRESIDENT'S Speech, the answer of the Senate, his reply to them, or the amendment now before us can imply it.

How happens it, that the real sentiments of the House are so much misrepresented by the vote? I shall be pardoned if I undertake to explain this enigma. Two reasons have been suggested in private conversation, as well as in debate, which will account for the vote of yesterday, and which, on being stated and re-examined, will afford good cause for changing it to-day. The first is, that we have nothing to do with the clubs. We hold them in too much contempt to have anything to say to them, or about them. They are not worth notice. This contempt had the appearance yesterday of countenance and patronage.

The other motive suggested is, if the words self-created societies should be struck out, the amendment will still contain the substance of the proposition contended for; which is to reprobate the combinations of men against law. This description will include the clubs, as well as any other wicked combinations that have had any agency in the insurrection.

How far the one or the other of these motives ought to influence those who have entertained them to vote against the amendment for inserting the words "self-created societies and," will appear by a survey of the true posture of the question.

Here Mr. AMES stated, that it was the duty of the PRESIDENT, by the Constitution, to inform Congress of the state of the Union. That he had accordingly in his Speech stated the insurrection and the causes which (he thought) had brought it on. Among them, he explicitly reckons the self-created societies and combinations of men to be one. The Senate as plainly charge that as one of the causes. The PRESIDENT, in his reply to the Senate, expresses his high satisfaction that they concur with him in opinion. Here Mr. A. read the passages in the Speech, Address, and Answer to the Address. He said further, that an amendment was now offered to the House, expressed, as nearly as may be, in the very words of the PRESIDENT; an objection is urged against this amendment that the proposition contained in it is not true in fact. It is also said, that although it were true, it would be dangerous to liberty to assent to it in our Answer to the Speech. It is moreover, say they, improper, unnecessary, and indecent, to mention the self-created societies. The amendment now urged upon the House has been put to vote in the Committee of the Whole House, and rejected. What will the world say, and that too from the evidence of our own records, if we reject it again in the House? Will it not be proclaimed that we reject the motion and give force and validity to the objections? Do we adopt such objections? Are the Committee consenting to the shame of having them charged upon the Committee as the principles by which they have guided our decision? We are not, Mr. A. was sure we are not; for with a very few exceptions—I wish there were none—both sides have united in reprobating the self-created societies. Surely, then, gentlemen will not hesitate to rescind a vote which is not less deceptive than it is pernicious? For, if we adopt the amendment, it will appear that all the branches of the Government are agreed in sentiment. If we reject it, what will it proclaim less than imbecility and discord? What will faction interpret it to import short of this? "The President and Senate have denounced the self-created societies alluded to in the Speech, and this House has stepped forward for their protection." Besides the unspeakable dishonor of this patronage, is it not rekindling the fire-brands of sedition? Is it not rekindling the demon of anarchy?

Few as the apologists of the clubs have been, the solemnity and perseverance of their appeal to principles, demand for it an examination.

The right to form political clubs has been urged, as if it had been denied. It is not, however, the right to meet, it is the abuse of the right after they have met, that is charged upon them. Town meetings are authorized by law, yet they may be called for seditious or treasonable purposes. The legal right of the voters in that case would be an aggravation, not an excuse, for the offence. But if persons meet in a club with an intent to obstruct the laws, their meeting is no longer innocent or legal; it is a crime.

The necessity for forming clubs has been alleged with some plausibility in favor of all the States, except New England, because town meetings are little known, and not practicable in a thinly settled country. But if people have grievances, are they to be brought to a knowledge of them only by clubs? Clubs may find out more complaints against the laws than the sufferers themselves had dreamed of. The number of those which a man will learn from his own and his neighbor's experience will be quite sufficient for every salutary purpose of reform in the laws, or of relief to the citizens. He may petition Congress, his own Representative may not fail to advocate, or, at least, to present and explain his memorial. As a juror, he applies the law; as an elector, he effectively controls the legislators. A really aggrieved man will be sure of sympathy and assistance within this body, and with the public. The most zealous advocate of clubs may think them useful, but he will not insist on their being indispensable so.

The plea for their usefulness seems to rest on their advantage of meeting for political information. The absurdity of this pretence could be exposed in a variety of views. I shall decline (said Mr. A.) a detailed consideration of the topic. I would just ask, however, whether the most inflamed party men, who usually lead the clubs, are the best organs of authentic information? Whether they meet in darkness; whether they hide their names, their numbers, and their doings; whether they shut their doors to admit information?

A laudable zeal for inquiry need not shut those who could satisfy it; it need not blush in the daylight. With open doors and an unlimited freedom of debate, political knowledge might be introduced even among the intruders.

But, instead of exposing their affected pursuit of information, it will be enough to show hereafter what they actually spread among the people—whether it is information, or, in the words of PRESIDENT, "jealousies, suspicions, and accusations of the Government;" whether, disregarding the truth, they have not fomented the daring outrages against the social order and the authority of the laws. (Vide the PRESIDENT'S Speech.)

They have arrogantly pretended sometimes to be the people, and sometimes the guardians, the champions of the people. They affect to feel more zeal for a popular Government, and to enforce more respect for Republican principles, than the real Representatives are admitted to entertain. Let us see whether they are set up for the people, or in opposition to them, and their institutions.

Will any reflecting person suppose, for a moment, that this great people, so widely extended, so actively employed, could form a common will and make that will law in their individual capacity, and without representation? They could not. Will clubs avail them as a substitute for representation? A few hundred persons only are members of clubs, and if they should act for the others, it would be an usurpation, and the power of the few over the many, in every view infinitely worse than sedition itself, will represent this Government.

To avoid this difficulty, shall the whole people be classed into clubs? Shall every six miles square be formed into a club sovereignty? Thus we should guard against the abuse of trust, because we should delegate none, but every man might go and do his business in his own person. We might thus form ten or twenty thousand democracies, as pure and simple as the most disorganizing spirit could sigh for; but what could keep this fair horizon unclouded? What could prevent the whirlwinds and fires of discord, intestine and foreign, from scattering and consuming these fritters and rags of the society, like the dry leaves in autumn? Without respectability, without safety, without tranquility, they would be like so many caves of Æolus, where the imprisoned storms were said to struggle for a vent. If we look at Greece, so famed for letters and more for misery, we shall see their ferocious liberty made their petty commonwealths wolves' dens—that liberty, which poetry represents as a goddess, history describes as a cannibal.

Representative Government, therefore, is so far from being a sacrifice of our rights, that it is their security; it is the only practicable mode for a great people to exercise or have any rights. It puts them into full possession of the utmost exercise of them. By clubs will they have something more than all? Will such institutions operate to augment, to secure, or to enforce their rights, or just the contrary?

Knowledge and truth will be friendly to such a Government, and that in return will be friendly to them. Is it possible for any to be so deluded as to suppose that the over-zeal for Government, on the part of the supporters of this amendment, would prompt them to desire or to attempt the obstruction of the liberty of speech, or the genuine freedom of the press? Impossible! That would be putting out the eyes of the Government which we are so jealous to maintain. The abuses of these privileges may embarrass and disturb our present system; but, if they were abolished, the Government must be changed. No friend, therefore, of the Constitution could harbor the wish to produce the consequences which it is insinuated are intended to ensue. Mr. A. resumed the remark that the Government rests on the enlightened patriotism of an orderly and moral body of citizens. Let the advocates of Monarchy boast that ignorance may be made to sleep in chains; that even corruption and vice may be enlisted as auxiliaries of the public order. It is, however, a subject of exultation and confidence that such citizens as we represent, so enlightened, so generally virtuous and uncorrupted, under the present mild Republican system, practically are safe, nay, more, it is evidently the only system that is adapted to the American state of society. But such a system combines within itself two indestructible elements of destruction, two enemies with whom it must conflict forever; whom it may disarm, but can never pacify—vice and ignorance. Those who do not understand their rights, will despise or confound them with wrongs, and those whose turbulence and licentiousness find restraints in equal laws, will seek gratification by evasions or combinations to overawe or resist them.

A Government that protects property, and cherishes virtue, will of course have vice and prodigality for its foes, because it will be compelled to abridge their liberty to prevent their invading the rights of other citizens. The virtuous and the enlightened will cling to a Republican Government, because it is congenial no less with their feelings than their rights. The licentious and the profligate are ever ready for confusion, which might give them every thing, while laws and order deny them every thing. The ambitious and desperate, by combinations, acquire more power and influence than their fellow-citizens; the credulous, the ignorant, the rash, and violent, are drawn by artifice, or led by character, to join these confederacies. The more free the Government, the more certain they are to grow up, for where there is no liberty at all, this abuse of it will not be seen. Once formed into bodies they have an esprit du corps, and are propelled into errors and excesses, without shame or reflection. A spirit grows up in their progress, and every disappointment makes them more loose, as to the means, and every success more and more immoderate in the objects of their attempt. Calumny is one of those means. Those whom they cannot punish or control, they can vilify; they can make suspicion go where their force could not reach, and by rumors and falsehoods multiply enemies against their enemies. They become formidable, and they retaliate upon the magistrates those fears which the laws have inspired them with. The execution of the laws is not accomplished without effort, without hazard. Instead of mildness, of mutual confidence, instead of the laws almost executing themselves, more rigor is demanded in the framing, more force to secure the operation of the laws. The clubs and turbulent combinations exercising the resisting power, it is obvious that Government will need more force, and more will then be given to it.

Thus it appears, that instead of lightening the weight of authority, it will require a new momentum from clubs and combinations formed to resist it. Turbulent men, imbibed into hosts, will call for more energy to suppress them than if the discontented remained unimbodied. Disturbances, fomented from time to time, may unhappily change the mild principles of the system, and the little finger then may be found heavier than the whole hand of the present Government. For if the clubs and the Government should both subsist, tranquility would be out of the question. The continual contest of one organized body against another would produce the alternate extremes of anarchy and excessive rigor of Government. If the clubs prevail, they will be the Government, and the more secure for having become so by a victory over the existing authorities.

In every aspect of the discussion, the societies formed to control and vilify a Republican Government are hateful. They not only of necessity make it more rigorous, but they tend with a fatal energy to make it corrupt. By perverting the truth and spreading jealousy and intrigue through the land, they compel the rulers to depend on new supports. The usurping clubs offer to faction within these doors the means of carrying every point without. A corrupt understanding is produced between them. The power of the clubs will prevail even here, and that of the people will proportionally decline. The clubs echo the language of their protectors here; truth, virtue, and patriotism, are no longer principles, but names for electioneering jugglers to deceive with. Calumny will assimilate to itself the objects it falls on. It will persecute the man who does his duty; it will take away the reward of virtue, and bestow praise only upon the tools of faction. By betraying his trust, a man may then expect the support of the powerful combinations opposed to the Government. By faithfully adhering to it, he encounters persecution. He finds neither refuge nor consolation with the public, who become at length so corrupted as to think virtue in a public station incredible, because it would be, in their opinion, folly. The indiscriminate jealousy which is diffused from the clubs tends no less to corrupt the suspicious than the suspected. It poisons confidence, which is no less the incitement than the recompense of public services. It lowers the standard of action.

These observations, which seem to be founded on theory, unfortunately bear the stamp of experience. History abounds with the proofs. Never was there a wise and free Republic, which was exempt from this inveterate malady. We can find a parallel for the brightest worthies of Greece, as well as for their calumniators. In that country, as well as in this, the assassins of character abounded. While slander is credited only by its inventors, it is easy for a man to maintain the severity of his contempt for both. But when it is adopted by the public, few are hardy enough to despise opinion; he that pretends to do so is a hypocrite, and if he really does so, he is a wretch. This precious property is one of the first objects of invasion, and the combinations alluded to are well adapted and actively employed to destroy it.

It is a plausible opinion, that if the Government is not grossly defective in its form, or corrupt in its administration, animosities against it will not exist. This corresponds neither with sound sense nor experience. Equal laws are the very grievances of these petty tyrants, who combine together to engross more than equal power and privileges. When power is conferred exclusively upon the worthy, the profligate and ambitious are driven to despair of success, by any methods that the worthy would adopt. The more pure and free the Government, the more certainly will the worst men it protects and restrains become its implacable enemies, and such men have ever been the foes of Republics. The outcasts from society, those who singly are shunned because infamy has smitten them with leprosy, men who are scorned with worse than plague sores, are the first to combine against it. And such men have the front to preach purity of principles and reformation. Such men will meet in darkness and perform incantations against liberty—there they will gather to meditate their poisons, to whet their daggers, to utter their blasphemies against liberty, and may proceed again to shout from that gallery, or may collect with cannon at this door, to perpetrate sacrilege here in her very sanctuary.

It will be asked what remedy for this evil? I answer no violent one. The gentle power of opinion, I flatter myself, will prove sufficient among our citizens who have sense, morals, and property. The hypocrisy of the clubs will be unmasked, and the public scorn, without touching their persons or property, will from them into nothing.

Mr. A. next proceeded to advert more particularly to facts. He made mention of the Jesuits, who were banished for becoming a club against the European Governments. He mentioned the Jacobins also, who performed well in pulling down the old Government, but because they would continue pulling down the new one, as such clubs ever will, had their hall locked up by Legendre. Our committees in 1774 and 1775, were efficient instruments to pull down the British Government. Yet, although they were friendly to our own, the people laid them aside as soon as they wished to build up instead of pulling down. If our Government were to be demolished, clubs would be a powerful means of doing it, and the people may choose to countenance them at that time. But as they choose no such thing at present, they will discountenance them. The Cincinnati were personally worthy men, officers of the most deserving army that ever triumphed. Yet, although they were friendly to the Government, and possessed the confidence of the citizen, by the most brilliant titles, the nature of their institution raised a jealousy and ferment. The State Legislatures condemned it, as setting up a Government within the Government. What then are we to say of clubs? Facts have been rather imprudently called for, and let them be examined.

The Democratic Society of Vermont state, as one reason for their establishment, the unmerited abuse with which the public papers have so often teemed against the Minister of our only ally. This was long after Genet's whole correspondence had been published, and after France had unequivocally disapproved his conduct.

Agreeably to a previous notification, there met at Pittsburgh, on the 21st of August, a number of persons, styling themselves "A Meeting of sundry Inhabitants of the Western Counties of Pennsylvania."

This meeting entered into resolutions not less exceptionable than those of its predecessors. The preamble suggests that a tax on spirituous liquors is unjust in itself and oppressive upon the poor, that internal taxes upon consumption must in the end destroy the liberties of the country in which they are introduced; that the law in question, from certain local circumstances which are specified, would bring immediate distress and ruin upon the Western country; and concludes with the sentiment, that they think it their duty to persist in remonstrances to Congress; and in every other legal measure that may obstruct the operation of the law.

The resolutions then proceed, first, to appoint a committee to prepare and cause to be presented to Congress an Address, stating objections to the law, and praying for its repeal. Secondly, to appoint committees of correspondence for Washington, Fayette, and Alleghany, charged to correspond together, and with such committees as should be appointed for the same purpose in the county of Westmoreland, or with any committees of a similar nature, that might be appointed in other parts of the United States; and, also, if found necessary, to call together either general meetings of the people, in their respective counties, or conferences of the several committees; and, lastly, to declare that they will in future consider those who hold offices for the collection of the duty, as unworthy of their friendship, that they will have no intercourse nor dealings with them, will withdraw from them every assistance, withhold all the comforts of life which depend upon those duties, that as men and fellow-citizens we owe to each other, and will upon all occasions treat them with contempt; earnestly recommending it to the people at large, to follow the same line of conduct towards them.

He mentioned the shameful transaction at Lexington, in Kentucky, where Mr. Jay was burned in effigy. It was painful, he said, thus to dwell on the dishonor of the country, but it was already published.

The club of Charleston, South Carolina, solicited an adoption of the Jacobin club at Paris. They also addressed Consul Margourit, who had actually granted commissions to privateers, in defiance of the President's Proclamation of Neutrality.

The club of Pinckney District in Carolina voted in favor of war and against paying taxes, because they were too far from the market.

A Virginia club had voted an alteration in the Constitution, in order that an amendment might prevent the President being again eligible. Is proof necessary to those who remember the state of this city last spring? Are the resolves of the clubs of this place and New York forgotten? Could outrage and audacity be expected to venture further? One denounced the excise as odious and tyrannical; the other, enforcing that sentiment, published its condemnation of Mr. Jay's mission of peace. Did not all of them arraign the whole Government, reprobate the whole system of laws, charge the breach of the Constitution on the President, and unspeakable turpitude on the Administration, as well as on this body? Surely Americans, feeling as they ought, for the honor and peace and safety of their country, cannot forget these excesses; they cannot remember them in any manner which my reprobation could enforce.

The following is an extract from the proceedings of a meeting of Delegates from the Election Districts of Alleghany county, held at Pittsburg, April 10, 1794, Thomas Morton in the Chair:

"At this juncture we have France to assist us, who should we now take a part, will not fail to stand by us until Canada is independent of Britain, and the instigators of Indian hostilities are removed; and should we lie by, while France is struggling for her liberties, it cannot be supposed that her Republic will embark in a war on our account after she shall have been victorious. It was for this reason, that though we approved of the conduct of the President and the Judiciary of the United States, in their endeavors to preserve peace and an impartial neutrality, until the sense of the nation had been taken on the necessity of retaliation by actually declaring war, yet now that the Congress have been convened, and such just grounds exist, we are weary of their tardiness in coming forward to measures of reprisal.

"But we have observed with great pain, that our councils want the integrity or spirit of Republicans. This we attribute to the pernicious influence of stockholders or their subordinates; and our minds feel this with so much indignancy, that we are almost ready to wish for a state of revolution, and the guillotine of France, for a short space, in order to indict punishment on the microscopists that enervate and disgrace our Government."

If the black charges thus brought against Congress and the whole Government were true, the people ought to fly to arms. They ought to pull down this tower of iniquity so as not to leave one stone upon another. The deluded Western people believed them true, and acted accordingly. The great mass of the discontented, therefore, are to be pitied for the ignorance and credulity which made them the dupes of the clubs. They thought they were doing God and their country service by cleansing this Augean stable of its filth. It was not oppression that roused them to arms, as some would insinuate; for their country flourishes wonderfully. It was an insurrection raised by the wicked arts of faction.

A moment, however, is due to the peculiar falsity of two of the slanders on this body. The fears of simple citizens have been startled with the false tale, that there is a Monarchy party in this House and the other. Look around, sir, said Mr. A., if you please, and decide whether there is one man, who is not principled as a Republican, who does not think such a form adapted to our people, and our people to it; and who would not shed his blood and spend his last shilling against the introduction of Monarchy? I persuade myself, sir, there is not even one man here whom any other member even thinks in his heart is to be suspected on that head.

The other slander which has contributed to kindle a civil war, is the paper nobility in Congress; that the taxes are voted for the sake, and carried solely by the strength of those who put the proceeds in their pockets. Is there a word of truth in this? On the contrary, there are probably not ten members who have any interest in the funds, and that interest very inconsiderable. Citizens have thus been led by calumny and lies to despise their Government and its Ministers, to dread and to hate it, and all concerned in it, so that the insurrection is chiefly owing to the men and the societies, who have invented, or confirmed, and diffused these slanders.

The fact is too notorious for any man even to pretend ignorance, that the insurgents were encouraged to take arms by the delusive hope that the militia would not turn out against them. Had they believed that the citizens were as firm for Government, as to their immortal honor they have shown that they are, would the folly or desperation of the Western people have proceeded to arms? They would not.

But the self-made societies had published that the rulers were tyrants, usurpers, and plunderers, abhorred by the people, who would soon hurl them down. Let us ask a moment's pause to reflect what would have been the fate of America, if these parricide clubs had really proceeded in poisoning the public mind, as completely as they attempted to do. The Western insurgents would have found armies not to suppress, but to assist them. This fair Edifice of Liberty, the palladium of our country, the world's hope, would have crumbled to powder.

Mr. A. then proceeded to notice some of the observations which had been urged against the motion. He asked whether, in a point that so nearly concerned truth and duty, the Committee could conciliate, that is, deny the truth and betray their duty. The proposition stated by the President was true, and had been proved to be so. Shall our silence suppress or contradict the dictates of this conviction?

It is urged that we have no right to pass this vote; a singular objection, since those who make it are consenting to the adoption of the clause, to which the words self-created societies are moved to be added. That clause is as improper, and as unconstitutional a declaration as the amendment. Is it possible that those are serious in this objection, who voted applause to General Wayne and his gallant army? Is this House a court-martial to try them if they had done ill instead of well? Had the State Legislatures no right to pass votes respecting the Cincinnati? Then we have no right to answer the Speech at all, as the Constitution is silent on that head. But are gentlemen who profess so much attachment to the people, and their rights, disposed to abolish one of the most signal, the character of this House as the grand inquest of the Nation, as those who are not only to impeach those who perpetrate offence, but to watch and give the alarm for the prevention of such attempts?

We are asked, with some pathos, will you punish clubs, with your censure, unheard, untried, confounding the innocent with the guilty? Censure is not punishment, unless it is merited, for we merely allude to certain self-created societies, which have disregarded the truth, and fomented the outrages against the laws. Those which have been innocent will remain uncensured. It is said, worthy men belong to those clubs. They may be as men not wanting in merit, but when they join societies which are employed to foment outrages against the laws, they are no longer innocent. They become bad citizens. If innocence happens to stray into such company, it is lost. The men really good will quit such connexions, and it is a fact, that the most respected of those who were said to belong to them, have long ago renounced them. Honest, credulous men may be drawn in to favor very bad designs, but so far as they do it, they deserve the reproach which this vote contains, that of being unworthy citizens.

If the worst men in society have led the most credulous and inconsiderate astray, the latter will undoubtedly come to reflection the sooner for an appeal to their sense of duty. This appeal is made in terms which truth justifies, and which apply only to those who have been criminal.

It is said, that this vote will raise up the clubs into importance. One member has even solemnly warned us against the awakening of their resentments. It is not clear to my understanding, (said Mr. A.) how all the consequences which have been predicted from this vote will be accomplished. This is a breach of right, a crushing of those free societies by our censure. It is putting of them down, and yet we are warned that it is raising them up, and making them stronger than this Government. The friends of the motion are said not to agree in the principle of their defence of it, and therefore it is boldly affirmed that they have no principle. Is there any difficulty in retorting this invective? If this vote will call the attention of the people of America to this subject, so much the better.

The truth will no doubt be sought and found at last, and with such an enlightened public, I expect the result will be made with its usual good sense. That the self-created societies described in the clause, are calculated to destroy a free Government; that they will certainly destroy its tranquillity and harmony, and greatly corrupt the integrity of the rulers, and the morals of the people. In the course of his remarks, Mr. A. strongly insisted that the vote was not indefinite in its terms. Societies were not reprobated because they were self-made, nor because they were political societies. Every body as readily admitted that they might be innocent, as they have been generally imprudent. It is such societies as have been generally imprudent. It is such societies as have been regardless of the truth, and have fomented the outrages against the law, &c.

Nor is the intention of this amendment to flatter the President, as it has been intimated. He surely has little need of our praise on any personal account. This late signal act of duty is already with his grateful country, with faithful history: nor is it in our power, or in those of any offended self-created societies, to impair that tribute which will be offered to him. As little ground is there for saying that it is intended to stifle the freedom of speech and of the press. The question is, simply, will you support your Chief Magistrate? Our vote does not go merely to one man and to his feelings. It goes to the trust. When clubs are arrayed against your Government, and your Chief Magistrate decidedly arrays the militia to suppress their insurrection, will you countenance or discountenance the officer? Will you ever suffer this House, the country, or even one seditious man in it, to question for an instant, whether your approbation and co-operation will be less prompt and cordial than his efforts to support the laws? Is it safe, is it honorable, to make a precedent, and that no less solemn than humiliating, which will authorize, which will compel every future President to doubt whether you will approve him or the clubs? The President now in office would doubtless do his duty promptly and with decision in such a case. But, can you expect it of human nature? and if you could, would you put it at risk whether in future a President shall balance between his duty and his fear of your censure. The danger is, that a Chief Magistrate, elective as ours is, will temporize, will delay, will put the laws into treaty with offenders, and will even insure a civil war, perhaps the loss of our free Government, by the want of proper energy to quench the first sparks. You ought, therefore, on every occasion, to show the most cordial support to the Executive in support of the laws.

This is the occasion. If it is dangerous to liberty, against right and justice, against truth and decency, to adopt the amendment, as it has been argued, then the President and Senate have done all this.

Mr. A. concluded with saying, that in a speech so long, containing such various matter, and so rapidly delivered, he might have dropped many observations in an incorrect state. He relied on the candor of the House, and of his opponents, for the interpretation of them.

The House now adjourned without taking any question.

THURSDAY, November 27.

An engrossed bill to authorize the President to call out and station a corps of militia in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania, for a limited time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. Corr, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of John R. Livingston; which was read the first time.

THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported on Tuesday last, from the Committee of the Whole House, to whom was referred the Address to the President of the UNITED STATES, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress. Whereupon,

The first amendment being under consideration, to insert as the second clause of the said Address, the words following, to wit:

"In tracing the origin and progress of the insurrection, we can entertain no doubt that certain combinations of men, careless of consequences and disregarding the truth, by disseminating suspicions, jealousy, and accusations of the Government, have had all the agency you ascribe to them, in fomenting this daring outrage against social order and the authority of the laws."

A motion was made and seconded to amend the said clause, by inserting, after the word "certain," the words "self-created societies and."

Mr. RUTHERFORD, continued his opposition to the motion. He repeated the substance of his former remarks on the conduct of those who appeared so solicitous to throw an odium on the Democratic societies. He contended that too much importance was given to these institutions; they were harmless of themselves, and if let alone, would have no more weight in the community than their conduct should entitle them to. If they promulgated truth, the people would hear them, and follow their advice; if not, they would sink into contempt. But what is the import of the motion? It savors of jealousy; a mere suspicion—of what? He saw nothing on which to found any such jealousy or suspicion. The people are satisfied with their own Government, they will support it. The people are happy and contented; why then raise doubts and difficulties? Why start at shadows? Why give consequence to trifles? "Trifles light as air, are to the jealous confirmations strong as proofs of Holy Writ." Let us dismiss this unmanly jealousy, and let us imitate the example set us by the State of Massachusetts. There was a man in that State by the name of Shays; he raised a bustle, and made a noise; but what did the Government do? Why, they despised him, and in a short time he sunk into insignificance.

Mr. BALDWIN said, he had, from the beginning, entertained doubts relative to the propriety of going into the business before the House in the minute manner proposed. Adverting to the usual process in conducting transactions of this nature, he observed, that the present appeared to be a deviation, if not an entire innovation, on the usual mode. During the recess, the President collected and arranged the information which he deemed proper to lay before the House; it cannot, therefore, be expected, that the House should at once, at the threshold of the session, enter into a minute answer to the communications of the President, containing facts and opinions the result of five or six months' experience and reflection, before they have had time to examine those opinions, and investigate those facts. This never was the practice of this House, and cannot be expected from them.

Mr. B. then adverted to the allegations which had been adduced against the Democratic societies; he questioned their authenticity. Excepting the statement in the possession of the House, (that of the Secretary of the Treasury,) he knew of no document affording any evidence of the facts alleged; and that assigned a different cause for the insurrection, for it appears by it that discontents had proceeded to a great height before the formation of these societies. It had been asserted that the House had a right to inquire into the causes of the insurrection. Let us proceed, then, as an inquest; let us call for the evidence, and sift the business to the bottom. At present, he insisted the House was not prepared to judge and decide. If the Speech must be echoed in every minute part, let us appoint a committee to digest and report a state of facts, as in the case of General St. Clair. In matters of notoriety—such as, that we were enjoying the blessings of peace, (when in truth that was the case,) or in respect to any other self-evident position that was in itself incontestable, he had no objection to an echo of the Address to the House; but on an occasion like the present, when there was such a contrariety of opinions, he could not see the propriety of it. He regretted the loss of time that the discussion had occasioned, and that it had not been employed in the more essential business of the session. As to Democratic societies, there were none, to his knowledge, in the State he represented, (Georgia); but if there were, he should not feel alarmed at the circumstance. He doubted whether the President meant to include the societies in general, under that denomination; he rather supposed he had references only to those in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania. As a more general idea, Mr. B. said, he preferred the expression combinations of men, &c. He was fully of opinion, that, rather than spin out the debate to any further length, it would be much more eligible to leave the subject altogether, and take up the other business of the nation. He was sure that the President, for whom he professed the highest respect, could not be pleased with this mode of conducting that before them.

Mr. MADISON said he entirely agreed with those gentlemen who had observed that the House should not have advanced into this discussion, if it could have been avoided; but having proceeded thus far, it was indispensably necessary to finish it. Much delicacy had been thrown into the discussion, in consequence of the Chief Magistrate; he always regretted the circumstance, when this was the case. This, he observed, was not the first instance of difference in opinion between the President and this House. It may be recollected that the President dissented both from the Senate and this House on a particular law, (he referred to that apportioning the Representatives); on that occasion, he thought the President right; on the present question supposing the President really to entertain the opinion ascribed to him, it affords no conclusive reason for the House to sacrifice its own judgment. It appeared to him, as it did to the gentleman from Georgia, that there was an innovation in the mode of procedure adopted on this occasion. The House are on different ground from that usually taken. Members seem to think that in cases not cognizable by law, there is room for the interposition of the House. He conceived it to be a sound principle, that an action innocent in the eye of the law could not be the object of censure to a Legislative body. When the people have formed a Constitution, they retain those rights which they have not expressly delegated. It is a question whether what is thus retained can be legislated upon. Opinions are not the objects of legislation. You advert on the abuse of reserved rights: how far will this go? It may extend to the liberty of speech, and of the press. It is in vain to say that this indiscriminate censure is no punishment. If it falls on classes, or individuals, it will be a severe punishment. He wished it to be considered how extremely guarded the Constitution was in respect to cases not within its limits. Murder, or treason, cannot be noticed by the Legislature. Is not this proposition, if voted, a vote of attainder? To consider a principle, we must try its nature, and see how far it will go: in the present case, he considered the effects of the principle contended for would be pernicious. If we advert to the nature of Republican Government, we shall find that the censorial power is in the people over the Government, and not in the Government over the people. As he had confidence in the good sense and patriotism of the people, he did not anticipate any lasting evil to result from the publications of these societies; they will stand or fall by the public opinion; no line can be drawn in this case. The law is the only rule of right: what is consistent with that, is not punishable; what is not consistent with that, is innocent, or at least not censurable by the Legislative body.

With respect to the body of the people, (whether the outrages have proceeded from weakness or wickedness,) what has been done, and will be done by the Legislature, will have a due effect. If the proceedings of the Government should not have an effect, will this declaration produce it? The people at large are possessed of proper sentiments on the subject of the insurrection; the whole Continent reprobates the conduct of the insurgents; it is not, therefore, necessary to take the extra step. The press, he believed, would not be able to shake the confidence of the people in the Government. In a Republic, light will prevail over darkness, truth over error: he had undoubted confidence in this principle. If it be admitted that the law cannot animadvert on a particular case, neither can we do it. Governments are administered by men: the same degree of purity does not always exist. Honesty of motives may at present prevail, but this affords no assurance that it will always be the case. At a future period, a Legislature may exist of a very different complexion from the present: in this view we ought not, by any vote of ours, to give support to measures which now we do not hesitate to reprobate.

The gentleman from Georgia had anticipated him in several remarks. No such inference can fairly be drawn as that we abandon the President, should we pass over the whole business. The vote passed this morning, for raising a force to complete the good work of peace, order, and tranquillity, begun by the Executive, speaks quite a different language from that which has been used to induce an adoption of the principle contended for. Mr. A. adverted to precedents; none parallel to the failure of the expedition under St. Clair was not in point. In that case, the House appointed a Committee of Inquiry into the conduct of an individual in the public service; the Democratic societies are not. He knew of nothing in the proceedings of the Legislature which warrants the House in saying, that institutions confessedly not illegal were subjects of Legislative censure.

Mr. DEXTER rose in reply to Mr. MADISON. He said that, if he viewed the subject as trivial as some gentlemen appeared to, he would not trouble the House with any further remarks, after having so long detained them while in Committee: if he viewed the amendment proposed as dangerous to the most perfect freedom of expressing political opinions, as the gentleman seemed to who was last up, he would be the last to support it. He said that the most certain way to destroy this freedom was, to encourage an unlimited abuse of it; and the way to render a free press useless, was to prostitute it to the base purposes of party and falsehood, until, wearied with constant impositions, the public would reject all information from that source as uncertain and delusive. He said that the most successful weapon used by the enemies of civil freedom ever had been, to push the ideas of liberty to such wild extremes as to render it impracticable and ridiculous, and thus to compel the sober part of the community to submit to usurpation as a less evil than utter insecurity and anarchy: he added, if America loses her liberty, this will be the instrument of her destruction. We possess, he said, greater equality of property and information than any other nation; the means of subsistence are so easily obtained, that no man is necessarily dependent on the will of another; from these circumstances, our country is more fit than any other for a Republican form of Government: if we fail in maintaining it, we shall be fairly considered to have made an experiment not only for ourselves, but for the world, which will prove that the beautiful theory of civil freedom is not practicable by man; that ambition and envy, aided by ignorance, are naturally too strong for patriotism.

Mr. D. said, that the nature of civil freedom is more obscure than its real friends could wish; that it consists rather in what it forbids than in what it allows; that man was free before he became a member of society: that the great object of associating was not to obtain freedom, for that was possessed before; but to guard against the abuse of it, in violating the rights of others. My liberty, he said, is, that all other citizens are restrained from violating my rights, and the liberty of each one of them is, that I and all others are equally restrained from violating his rights. Restrained, then, is necessary to constitute civil liberty; and the uniformity of this restraint, as it operates equally on all classes of citizens, is equality. I know, sir, that a doctrine very different from this has been held by some false apostles of liberty, and that the aspiring, the vicious, the desperate, and the weak, have flocked to this standard: by them the power to violate the rights of others, and disturb the public peace with impunity, has been profanely called liberty, and the universality of this has been called equality. Can I be a freeman, sir, if the Government which is my only security for all my rights, may be invaded with impunity, and my reputation, the dearest of all possessions, and the best reward of virtue, blasted by the foul breath of slander and falsehood? When this shall be admitted as a principle in the American code, we shall call that freedom which will be our misery; we shall cease to deserve liberty; we shall need a master. Let men meet for deliberating on public matters; let them freely express their opinions in conversation or in print, but let them do this with a decent respect for the will of the majority, and for the Government and rulers which the people have appointed; let them not become a band of conspirators, to make and propagate falsehood and slander; let them not instigate to the highest crimes against society; and, sir, if any have so done, let not us encourage them in these outrages by calling them the exercise of the inviolable rights of freemen,

To suffer misrepresentations of Government to gain credit among the people, is giving a blow to the weakest part of our Government. It would be a most important political acquisition, if means could be devised to scatter through the Union true ideas of the measures of Government. The best intentions cannot now guard the citizens from being deceived, by the cunning and depraved: some improvement on this subject seems essentially necessary to perfect the system of political freedom. Scattered, as our countrymen are, over an immense country, and employed in useful industry, perhaps this is rather to be wished for than expected; but we can at least take measures to prevent the most fatal effects from misrepresentations and scandal.

Mr. D. said, he had made these remarks as being applicable to most of the reasoning against the proposed amendment, and particularly to that of the gentleman from Virginia, who last sat down, [Mr. MADISON.] He was no more inclined to infringe rights which the people had reserved than that gentleman; but he did not know any article or principle of the Constitution by which the people had reserved to themselves the precious right of vilifying and misrepresenting their own Government and laws, and exciting treason and rebellion, with impunity. However inestimable the right of free discussion of public matters, and of a free press, might be, (and no man valued them more highly than himself,) he thought that when they were so abused as to become hostile to liberty, and threaten her destruction, the abuses ought to be corrected; and he argued from the principle of self-preservation, that the Government of every country must have the right to do so. Unless those are more sacred than the very liberty they are designed to secure, this cannot be denied.

Mr. D. observed, that Mr. MADISON had stated as a principle from which to argue, and on which almost all his deductions were founded, a proposition so doubtful in itself, that it ought rather to be proved, than assumed as a first principle from which to reason, viz. that we cannot rightfully intermeddle in any way with a subject which we cannot regulate by law. Admitting it to be a true and self-evident proposition, however, he said, it concluded nothing against the amendment: for it would still remain to be proved, which it never could be, that the Legislature had no right to restrain such abuses by law. He did not think it necessary or expedient to make any law on the subject; he hoped it never would be; but he did not doubt the right to forbid such flagrant outrages on social order, and all arts tending to produce them. There can be no better proof, he said, that such laws may be made, than that they now exist. Mr. MADISON had mentioned religious societies as not to be prohibited by law: as such, Mr. D. said they clearly could not be; no more could harmless discussions of political subjects by individuals or associations. But would any man doubt, when under the pretence of the exercise of these rights the blackest crimes were instigated and perpetrated, that the law had a right to punish? The clubs have waged war not only with the Government which the people have instituted and the rulers which they have appointed, but they have counteracted all the most essential principles of Republicanism. They, being a small minority, have attempted to control the majority; to usurp a power which the people never delegated to them; to act as censors, nay, controllers of the Government and laws; they are responsible to nobody for the exercise of it, and are to continue in office as long as they shall please. Such societies have all the properties, except the power, of absolute despotism; yet these tyrants prate about liberty, and profane the name of Republicanism.

Mr. D. adverted to Mr. MADISON's observation that the censure intended must be a punishment, and that the House had no Constitutional right to convict of or punish for crimes. If the proposed amendment be a punishment, he said, it is of a singular kind; it is punishment in the abstract, without an object punished. It says that certain self-created societies have trespassed. Can this be called a stigma on all such societies? The word certain forbids this construction. Which society is punished? None; unless conscience or public opinion shall designate the object.

The President, in another part of his Address, has lamented that certain citizens have shown themselves capable of an insurrection; and we have done the same in our Answer. Is this a stigma on all citizens? It had been repeatedly said, that the measure is unnecessary, because the danger has subsided; but, he asked, is it not necessary to inform the people from whence the evil arose, to guard against a repetition of it? Can we always presume on the same prompt patriotism of a future Executive, or the same public confidence in his measures and compliance with his requisitions? or, on the same good fortune in reclaiming or subjugating the disobedient? There was a time, when the insurrection was truly formidable; it rose like a water-spout, threatening to annihilate gravity, and throw the ocean to Heaven; and as that, by force of the general principle of attraction, returns again to its former level, and mixes with the surrounding waters, so this civil tumult has been overcome by the energy of the laws; but it is folly to incur future evils, presuming on similar good fortune. The heavy hand of despotism may forcibly hold down the scale which preponderates, and preserves public order; but in free establishments like ours, where the scales are nicely balanced, the smallest breath disturbs the equilibrium.

A gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] has compared the amendment to the denunciations of France. Those were not uttered by the organs of the public will; they were denunciations of individuals, or self-created societies against individuals; whereas this is neither. This is only stating a fact for public information. The same gentleman, and many others, have said that we have not sufficient evidence of this fact. We know, sir, that resolutions of such societies, encouraging rebellion, were made and published; we know that their natural effect did take place.

Knowing, then, both the cause and effect, can we doubt of their connexion? If I see a firelock pointed at a man, hear the discharge, see the man fall, I, on inspection, find a ball lodged in his body—can I doubt as to the cause of the death of the man, because I could not see the ball pass from the muzzle to the man? Must we see things, in their nature invisible, before we believe? The President has been present at the scene of insurrection; we have his testimony on the subject, and other official communications are not wanting. We have the pointed testimony of the member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Scott,] who was an eye-witness. He tells us that the club there directed the insurrection; that the same men were leaders in the club and in the field; and that they corresponded with other clubs. The gentleman from Virginia, last alluded to, has said that discontent and disturbance existed there prior to the establishment of clubs. But, does it follow from this that their measures, when established, did not increase the evil, and, by deceiving the malcontent, and the disposition of the people, encourage them to take arms? The clubs declared they spoke the opinion of the people, and the deluded insurgents believed them. The same gentleman has said that the President addresses the public, and not us, on this subject, and therefore does not expect an answer. Why, sir, shall not we join in the Address, if it be true and useful? The Senate have done it; if we do not, we seem to contradict it. If we do not, we create a dangerous disagreement between the different branches of Government, distract the public mind, and encourage disorders.

If the member from Pennsylvania is to be credited, (and no man will dispute his testimony,) the clubs are more criminal than the deluded insurgents; yet we have censured the latter without reserve. Why, sir, has the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Giles] criminated so severely our zeal on this question? Why has he condemned the oratory it has excited, when he often gives us such handsome specimens of it? If liberty and our country are in danger, it is treason to be cold. From the gentleman's censures on the loose reasoning and warmth in favor of the amendment, we were led to expect from him the most dispassionate demonstration; yet the gentleman appeared in some of his reasoning, more ingenious than solid; it was too fine-spun to be strong. The strength of his understanding, like the intense heat of the sun, produced a vapor to obscure its own effulgence. One plain distinction is an answer to most of the reasoning of this gentleman and his colleagues. We do not contend for controlling, or even animadverting, on the rights of opinion, or of publishing opinions. We wish only to call the attention of the public to the abuses of those rights, and the crimes such abuses have produced, (which endanger the existence of those very rights, and liberty in general,) in order that the people, knowing the evil, may themselves correct it.

Mr. Nicolson, after a short apology for speaking again, observed, the gentleman who amused the House yesterday, and the gentleman who just sat down, have so far fallen short of their object, that he should be pardoned in taking a review of the subject. The gentlemen have adopted this mode: they first propose a question, and from a comparison of the mischiefs arising on the different decisions, urge a right to decide, when no such right is contended to exist. What is the evidence on which we are to decide? the testimony of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? He refers to one society only. Adverting to the Address, Mr. N. expressed his surprise that so much aid had been drawn from that quarter. He respected the President—he believed his declarations; but this imposed no obligation to add his own. Noticing Mr. DEXTER's remarks on the abuse of the liberty of the press, he adverted to the publications of the Democratic societies; if they are so false as is pretended, they will defeat themselves. He noticed the concession which had been made, that societies for political information are legal, and may be useful: taking this for granted, he insisted that they had a right to censure as well as to inform; for, without this right, the concession amounts to nothing. He noticed the argument that the censure being general, does not amount to individual censure. If it is not general and the general proposition is of no use, and is nugatory. He noticed the assertion of Mr. DEXTER, that the House had a right to legislate in this case. Mr. N. remarked, that by this mode the House precluded the regular course of legislation, by a single vote, at the commencement of the session. We are called upon to support the President: but what are we to support—his actions or his opinions? The Constitution does not depend on the President; but the President has only stated an opinion to the people, and leaves it to them to reflect on it. He lamented that the President's weight and influence was brought so often into debate. He had heard it said it was part of a system: he wished it might not be injurious to him or to the Government.

Mr. MORTIMER was of opinion that Mr. DEXTER, and some members on that side of the question, had laid much stress upon a very insignificant sort of argument. You must vote this way or that way, because, if you do not, the citizens of the United States will imagine that the whole House of Representatives are in favor of Democratic societies. One gentleman [Mr. Ames] had told us that Fame, or Calumny, with one hundred, or one hundred thousand tongues, was flying over every Post Road on the Continent, and proclaiming that forty-five or forty-seven members of Congress were in favor of Democratic societies. It had likewise been alleged, that if the amendment could be carried, that if the amendment whole weight of the House of Representatives against the societies. Mr. M. considered this reasoning as entirely chimerical. The people knew, by this time, as well as the House itself did, that they were divided by a majority of one or two, and, which ever party gained the victory, the people would pay as much respect to the votes of forty-five members on one side, as of forty-seven on the other. The trifling difference of two or three votes would make no impression whatever, in forming the sentiments of the public.

Did gentlemen imagine that the President, admitting that he was in any way interested in their decision, could feel any great satisfaction in a majority of forty-seven against forty-six? Or was the weight of the forty-six members to be destroyed, with the public, merely because they were outvoted by such a narrow majority? If the amendment was voted at all, it would be in this way; and he could not possibly see what advantage any party was to reap from having such a majority. The people at large know, as well as the House, the state of the votes on the amendment; and at any rate, they will judge for themselves. He wished the thing to fall asleep; and, as the most peaceable way to get rid of it, he should, if seconded, move the previous question.

Several gentlemen rose to second the motion. Mr. SENECA and Mr. DAYTON declared that it was out of order. It would bring the House into such a dilemma, that they could not get forward with the business either one way or another.

After some dispute, this point of form was referred to the SPEAKER. He declared that the motion for the previous question was in order, the question being on the amendment. This opinion was overruled by the House. The House was then going to divide, when—

Mr. CARNES rose.—He was entirely against the amendment. It denounced vengeance against all societies: this was extremely unjust. It would be better for the House to speak out like men, and name the culprits. Let a committee be appointed, if it must take notice of the affair, and let them inquire and report what was the real cause of the late insurrection. Mr. C. gave an instance of a Democratic society that turned out as volunteers against the rioters. Do we think, (said Mr. C.,) that the President interests himself in our Address? Sir, the President is not to be amused with trifles. He is not to be tickled with the turn of a paragraph. What! are we to answer a line and a half of a Speech, with a vote that strikes at the soul of all society? Are we to point the finger of execration indiscriminately? What will be the effect, sir, of this conduct? A gentleman [Mr. SENECA] told you the other day, that Democratic societies had produced the insurrections; but when, in the course of his observations, he became a little more animated, he told us that a foreign Envoy, Genet, had been the cause of all this mischief. If this be true, the Democratic societies are innocent. Sir, by this amendment you would prevent the freedom of speech, and lock the mouths of men. They are not to censure the measures of Government, and then bad men may do what they please with it. I hope, sir, that the day will never come, when the people of America shall not have leave to assemble, and speak their mind. It is acknowledged that this affair is not an object of Judicial cognizance. This overstraining always defeats its own purpose. The trial of Muir, and others, on flimsy grounds, have done more service to the cause of their party than if they had received a reinforcement of five thousand fighting men.

As to the comparison between this matter and St. Clair's failure, there was no sort of similarity or correspondence between them. In that case, the House had employed servants, and was entitled to look into their conduct. The present amendment, on the contrary, holds up no determinate object, and has ill-nature and asperity on the very face of it. When the President in his Speech, mentioned the self-created societies, he did not address himself to the House of Representatives but to the people at large. But if it was to become the rule, in framing a reply, to make it an exact echo of the Speech itself—if there was no necessity for exercising our judgments, he considered the House as losing time. It would be much better to take the Speech at once, turn the other end uppermost, and send it back to the President as fast as possible. As to this all-powerful resolution, which was to go into those dark cells of which the House had been told, it would be much better to give the gentleman [Mr. W. SMITH] a blacking-brush, and send him into them to mark out the guilty. The House would then know how to proceed.

Mr. C. objected to Mr. DEXTER's comparison, of a man shot dead by a ball. He wanted the gentleman to show him the bullet; or, in plain terms, to show him a letter from the Democratic societies of New York or Philadelphia, addressed to the Western people, and exciting them to insurrection; but as the gentleman could show him no such thing, Mr. C. utterly denied the propriety of the parallel.

Mr. W. SMITH thought it somewhat strange that, at this time of day, members should be calling for facts, when these are so well known to all the House. He then read a set of resolutions, dated 8th of May last, adopted and published by the Democratic society of Philadelphia. These resolutions condemned, in the most unqualified terms, the appointment of John Jay as Minister from the United States to the Court of London, because they say he had formerly declared that the British were entitled to keep the Western posts, and because it was contrary to the Constitution to appoint a Judge to a diplomatic station. The strongest censure was likewise cast upon the Executive, for having made such an appointment. These resolutions were circular, and voted to be sent to all the Democratic societies in the United States.

Mr. S. next observed, that individual Legislatures in the Union had passed votes of censure on this House; and he did not see, by a parity of reasoning, why the House might not also pass votes of censure. Mr. S. said, that there had been a great change of sentiments of some members of that House. About two years ago, the House of Representatives had determined, by thirty-five votes against sixteen, to pass an opinion on the new Constitution of France; and the gentlemen who had then exercised the right, now denied that the House had it. Mr. S. concluded by saying, that the President had denounced the Democratic societies, and they had denounced him.

Mr. GILES rose and said, that the charge of inconsistency rested with the member last up; who, in the case referred to, had asserted that the House had no right to pass a vote of opinion; yet, on the present question insisted that they had. Mr. G. was one of the thirty-five who voted for an exercise of opinion, but this was only for returning a civil answer to a civil letter from the Republic of France. The gentlemen who gave that vote for an answer, knew that they were not to give an opinion where they could not legislate. There was, therefore, no inconsistency on the part of these members, but with the gentleman from South Carolina. Mr. G. informed the House of his having this moment learned, that in the army, in the Western counties, there was nothing talked of but overturning Democratic societies. Nobody could tell where this matter might end.

Mr. W. SARIN, in reply to Mr. GILES cleared himself from any inconsistency in the case alluded to, by asserting that he had not denied the right of the House, but the propriety of the exercise of it. He had disapproved of the House giving an opinion of the merits or demerits of the French Constitution, which, as France was in a revolutionary state, was liable to frequent change; and the event had justified him, for the House had scarce passed the vote which extolled that Constitution as a model of wisdom and magnanimity, when the French themselves denounced it, as inconsistent with their rights and liberties. But the gentleman from Virginia was undoubtedly inconsistent, for he had, on that occasion, contended for the right of the House to give its opinion, and that in a case where the answer was to be given to the Sovereign of a foreign nation, respecting the affairs and policy of a foreign country. If the House were right on that occasion, a fortiori, ought they now, when called on by our Chief Magistrate, to give an opinion at an important crisis respecting the affairs of our own country?

The question was then put, Shall the words "self-created societies and" be replaced in the amendment of Mr. FITZSIMONS? This was carried by a majority of forty-seven against forty-five. The yeas and nays were taken on this question, and were as follow:

NAYS.—Theodore Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Isaac Coles, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Gabriel Duval, William Findley, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, George Hancock, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, Daniel Heister, John Hunter, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, John Neville, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Andrew Pickens, Francis Preston, Robert Rutherford, John S. Smith, Thomas Tredwell, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, and Joseph Winston.

Another motion was then made by Mr. CHRISTIE, further to amend the said clause by inserting, after the words "combinations of men," the words "in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania, and parts adjacent."

And, on the question thereupon, it was resolved in the affirmative, the House being equally divided, to wit: yeas 46, nays 46.

The SPEAKER declaring himself with the yeas. The yeas and nays, as demanded by one-fifth of the members present, were as follow:

YEAS.—Theodore Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Isaac Coles, William J. Dawson, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Gabriel Duval, William Findley, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, George Hancock, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, Daniel Heister, John Hunter, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, John Neville, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Andrew Pickens, Francis Preston, Robert Rutherford, John S. Smith, Israel Smith, Thomas Tredwell, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, and Joseph Winston.

NAYS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, Samuel Dexter, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Samuel Griffin, William B. Grove, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Wilkes Kitters, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, Francis Malbone, William Van Murray, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, John S. Sherburne, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gasbeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, John Watts, and Paine Wingate.

Another motion was then made, by Mr. SARIN, of South Carolina, further to amend the said clause, by inserting, after the word "adjacent," in the amendment last agreed to, the words "countenanced by self-created societies elsewhere."

And, on the question thereupon, it passed in the negative—yeas 42, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, Samuel Dexter, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, James Gordon, Thomas Hartley, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Wilkes Kitters, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, Richard Bland Lee, Francis Malbone, William Van Murray, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gasbeck, Peleg Wadsworth, Artemas Ward, John Watts, and Paine Wingate.

NAYS.—Theodore Bailey, Abraham Baldwin, Thomas Blount, Thomas P. Carnes, Gabriel Christie, Thomas Claiborne, Isaac Coles, William J. Dawson, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Gabriel Duval, William Findley, William B. Giles, James Gillespie, Nicholas Gilman, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, George Hancock, Carter B. Harrison, John Heath, Daniel Heister, John Hunter, Matthew Locke, William Lyman, Nathaniel Macon, James Madison, Joseph McDowell, Alexander Mebane, William Montgomery, Andrew Moore, Peter Muhlenberg, John Neville, Anthony New, John Nicholas, Nathaniel Niles, Alexander D. Orr, Josiah Parker, Andrew Pickens, Francis Preston, Robert Rutherford, John S. Sherburne, John S. Smith, Israel Smith, Thomas Tredwell, Philip Van Cortlandt, Abraham Venable, Francis Walker, and Joseph Winston.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said clause, amended to read as followeth:

"In tracing the origin and progress of the insurrection, we can entertain no doubt that certain self-created societies and combinations of men in the four Western counties of Pennsylvania, and parts adjacent, careless of consequences, and disregarding the truth, by disseminating suspicious, jealous, and accusations of the Government, have had all the agency you ascribe to them, in fomenting this daring outrage against social order and the authority of the laws."

It passed in the negative, nineteen members only rising in the affirmative.

An adjournment was then called for, and carried.

FRIDAY, November 28.

A petition of a number of Germans, residing in the county of Augusta, in the State of Virginia, was presented to the House and read, stating the inconveniences to which they are subjected, from an entire ignorance of the English language, and praying that a certain portion of the laws of the United States may be printed in the German language. Laid on the table.

A bill for the relief of John R. Livingston was read the second time, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

ADDRESS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported on Tuesday last, from the Committee of the Whole House to whom was referred the Address to the President of the United States, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; whereupon,

The second amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House, being again read at the Clerk's table, was, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House.

A motion was then made and seconded further to amend the said Address, by inserting, after the word "insurrection," in the first paragraph, the following clause:

"And we learn, with the greatest concern, that any misrepresentations whatever, of the Government and its proceedings, either by individuals or combinations of men, should have been made, and so far credited, as to foment the flagrant outrage which has been committed on the laws."

Mr. TRACY said, that he should vote for this amendment, if the gentleman [Mr. NICHOLAS] would insert between the words "been" and "so far credited" the addition of made and. This would make the whole read better.

[The additional words were immediately inserted by Mr. NICHOLAS.]

Mr. McDOWELL said, that twenty-five days of the session were now elapsed, and he was at a loss to know what the House had been doing. This was a very serious matter, and must give real concern to every friend of the country.

Mr. HILLHOUSE proposed to refer the whole subject back to the committee, to draw up a new Address, such as would suit the sentiments of both parties in a middle course.

Mr. HEATH declared himself heartily tired of the discussion, which tended only to revive odious distinctions. He wished to adopt the motion for referring back again to the committee. He had felt extreme uneasiness during the whole time of these debates, at the nature of them.

Mr. BALDWIN felt a very mortifying impression at having been, this week, a witness to such trifling as had taken place in the House. We have spent four days in drawing up an Address, and are now just about where we set out. While the most extraordinary events which the world ever saw are passing, we cannot get at the papers on the table, to see how far we are concerned in these events, on account of so small a matter. He would agree to nothing but what would decide the point instantaneously.

Mr. McDOWELL thought that it would be very odd to be sending this matter back to a committee. In the interim, we proceed to dispatch the business recommended in the Speech, and about the end of the session we come forward with an Address, telling the President that we are going to take his Speech into consideration. The affair would have a very odd appearance on the Journal of the House.

Mr. NICHOLAS said that it was well known to be the practice to refer such a thing back to the former committee. These gentlemen, three in number, had all declared their sentiments. Two were for the vote of censure, and a third against it. They would, no doubt, continue in the same mind. The one member [Mr. MADISON] would be out-voted. The substance of the amendment, rejected after so long a struggle, would be put in again, and the whole be to commence anew. He had no other design in his amendment than to conciliate. He assured the members on the other side of the question, that he never would consent to a recommitment.

Mr. DAVENPORT said, that the member from Virginia had talked of conciliation. "Give me all my own way, and we shall have no debate." Who began the number of amendments this morning? Was it not that gentleman? And if he comes out with his amendments, are not other members to be at equal liberty of bringing up theirs? Mr. D. did not believe that there would have been a single motion of that kind this morning, if the gentleman himself had not begun it. "Come," says he, "let us conciliate. You shall all do just as I please, and we shall all agree." Mr. D. was for the recommitment to a committee.

Mr. AMES gave much credit to Mr. NICHOLAS for his amendment, which, he doubted not, was proposed with the best intentions. He was quite tired, if not ashamed, of the debate. Two divisions in the House, each consisting of forty-six, gave the world but a bad prospect of our conciliation and unanimity through the rest of the session.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was against the commitment. What would our common parent (the President) say, if he saw us thus drawn into the tenter-hooks of party?

The question was taken on recommitting the Address, and negatived—yeas 43, nays 48.

The motion of Mr. NICHOLAS was then put. Mr. MURRAY wanted the word "societies" inserted.

Mr. GOODHUE imagined that it was no matter whether or not, combinations of men are undoubtedly societies.

Mr. NICHOLAS would consider the adoption of the word "societies," as a signal of victory to the gentlemen on the other side of the question. He therefore would not consent to its admission.

Mr. TRACY had promised to vote for the motion as it stood. But he should declare to his learned friend from Maryland, and to the Whole House, that, by "combinations of men," (the words in the amendment of Mr. NICHOLAS,) he understood the Democratic societies.

The amendment of Mr. NICHOLAS was carried by a large majority.

The Address, as amended, was then read throughout at the Clerk's table, as follows:

SIR: The House of Representatives, calling to mind the blessings enjoyed by the people of the United States, and especially the happiness of living under constitutions and laws which rest on their authority alone, could not learn, with other emotions than those you have expressed, that any part of our fellow citizens should have shown themselves capable of an insurrection. And we learn, with the greatest concern, that any misrepresentations whatever, of the Government and its proceedings, either by individuals or combinations of men, should have been made, and so far credited as to foment the flagrant outrage which has been committed on the laws. We feel, with you, the deepest regret at so painful an occurrence in the annals of our country. As men regardless of the tender interests of humanity, we look with grief at scenes which might have stained our land with civil blood. As lovers of public order, we lament that it has suffered so flagrant a violation; as zealous friends of Republican Government, we deplore

Resolved, That Mr. SPEAKER, attended by the House, do present the said Address; and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. SCOTT, be a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the same.

Mr. GILES, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes; which was read twice and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Treasurer of the United States, accompanying his account of receipts and expenditures of public moneys, from the 1st of April to the 30th of June, 1794; also, his account of payments and receipts for the War Department, from the 1st of July to the 30th of September, 1794, inclusive; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, to know when and where it will be convenient for him to receive the Address of this House, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress, reported that the committee had waited on the President, who signified to them that it would be convenient to him to receive the said Address at twelve o'clock to-morrow, at his own house.

Ordered, That the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of George Blanchard, in behalf of Edward Blanchard, which was made to this House on the 14th of May last, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated by Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, on the 20th instant, and made a farther progress therein.

SATURDAY, November 29.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Arthur St. Clair, Major General and Commander-in-Chief of the expedition carried on against the Western Indians, in the year 1791, requesting a speedy decision on the report of the committee appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of the said expedition; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to report whether any, and what, alterations are necessary in the act, entitled "An act concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels." Also, in the act, entitled "An act for enrolling and licensing ships or vessels to be employed in the coasting trade and fisheries, and for regulating the same." Also, in the act, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of the duties imposed by law, on goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into the United States, and on the tonnage of ships or vessels."

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. Good-

HUZ, Mr. COTY, Mr. BENJAMIN BOWEN, Mr. FITZSIMMONS, and Mr. PARKER.

The SPEAKER, attended by the House, then withdrew to the house of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, and there presented to him the Address of this House, in answer to his Speech to both Houses of Congress; to which the PRESIDENT made the following reply:

Gentlemen: I anticipated, with confidence, the concurrence of the House of Representatives in the regret produced by the insurrection. Every effort ought to be used to discountenance what has contributed to foment it; and thus discourage a repetition of like attempts. For, notwithstanding the consolations which may be drawn from the issue of this event, it is far better that the arduous approaches to such a situation of things should be checked by the vigilant and duly admonished patriotism of our fellow-citizens, than that the evil should increase until it becomes necessary to crush it by the strength of their arms.

I am happy that the part which I have myself borne on this occasion receives the approbation of your House. For the discharge of a Constitutional duty, it is a sufficient reward to me to be assured that you will unite in consummating what remains to be done.

I feel, also, great satisfaction in learning that the other subjects which I have communicated or recommended, will meet with due attention; that you are deeply impressed with the importance of an effectual organization of the Militia; and that the advance and success of the army under the command of General Wayne is regarded by you, no less than myself, as a proof of the perseverance, prowess, and superiority of our troops.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Report from the Secretary of War, respecting the fortifications of the United States, made pursuant to the resolution of this House of the 21st instant; which was read, and ordered to be referred to Mr. FITZSIMMONS, Mr. GOODHUE, Mr. BOWEN, Mr. MALBONE, and Mr. MACON, with instruction to examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

MONDAY, December 1.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the relief of John R. Livingston; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from farther proceeding in the said bill, and that it be committed to the Committee of Claims.

A petition of sundry inhabitants, living between the lines commonly called Walker's and Henderson's lines, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that the line known by the name of Walker's line, may be established by Congress, as the boundary between the States of Virginia and North Carolina.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. PIERSON, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. PICKENS; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

Promulgation of the Laws.

[DECEMBER, 1794.]

Ordered, That the petition of a number of Germans, residing in the county of Augusta, in the State of Virginia, which lay on the table, be referred to the committee last appointed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of Moses Myers; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

PROMULGATION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. MOORE made a motion that a committee should be appointed to report a method for the more regular and effectual promulgation of the laws of the United States.

Mr. BALDWIN rose and observed, that in a country so extensive as America, and where the people are so widely scattered, it was a work of immense difficulty to have a regular and accurate account of the measures of Government communicated through every part of the Union. The importance of this object was equal to its difficulty. At the present time Government is a subject of such general agitation in these parts of the world with which we are most acquainted, and connected, that the opinions and passions of men are there in a state of high fermentation. This country has a share of it, and, upon the common principles of human nature, that is unavoidable. Circumstances have, on this occasion, given to the American Government a kind of importance which, from a comparison of ourselves to the rest of the world, we should not have presumed to arrogate. Legislation is in its nature a practical subject, and all men of sense and observation, in their reasonings upon it, give great weight to experience.

One single fact is, in their view, more important than whole volumes of ingenious theory and declamation. As we regard the happiness of our country, and as we regard the success of this kind of Government, which has the rights and happiness of men for its object, we ought to do all in our power to guard against the dangers to which it is exposed, and to cultivate it to the highest possible perfection. Mr. B. considered this country as imminently exposed on two quarters. One of these was the love of power in overbearing individuals, which will for ever stimulate them to sacrifice the rights and happiness of others to their own raging passion. On the other hand, there may arise a jealous and groundless apprehension of this passion, where it does not exist, which goes to the destruction of all confidence in those who are in public trust, and which defeats all their efforts for the public good. It was not material to determine which of these was most likely to be the source of frequent and formidable danger. It is not improbable that the one or the other will be found by experience to predominate at different times, from the accidents which bring different men into place. Referring to the motion just now made, Mr. B. observed, that if the people are properly informed, and do their duty, it will be easy to guard against both these evils. That there will be ambitious men, even in this age, and in this country, there can be no doubt, nor that ambition will here practice its old efforts. To pretend that this age or country will be exempted, is at best a mark of ignorance or folly. The love of power is one of the first and strongest passions in the human breast. The talents, which vindicate their way to the first place in Government, are most frequently accompanied with a proportionable share of ambition. This is equally the case in limited Governments as in others. Perhaps it will even be found to be more so. The greater the limitations, the more restive and uneasy will be the passion. The shorter the chain which limits their indulgence, the more will it be quarrelled with. Our Government is not founded on an idea that this disposition does not exist, but it guards against its ill effects. If proper attention is paid to preserve, as far as possible, the exact distribution of powers between the Federal and State Governments, and between the different departments and officers of Government; and if the conduct of public functionaries be surrounded with light, there is great reason to hope that they will keep each other in their proper places, and that, for a long time to come, the public happiness will be secured.

Mr. B. then spoke of the second description of persons before mentioned, and from whom he said much danger and trouble might be expected in all free Governments. They were always grumbling and finding fault with public men and public measures. Like the former, these people are also commonly actuated by ambition, and frequently by that of the most dangerous and blackest kind. No measures were so good, and no men so honest, as to escape their attack, yet they never applied any remedy. Follow them throughout their whole lives, and you find few instances of any good which they have done. A conscious inferiority of character prevents them from seeking openly places of the first confidence, till they have, by their poison in the dark, destroyed those whom their fellow-citizens had always considered as their superiors in wisdom and honesty. They do not hesitate to destroy the peace of society, and destroy the happiness of a whole community, to get into office themselves, and to indulge their ambition. It cannot be too much regretted, that such a shameful course should, from the fears and ignorance of society, become so much a high road to places of office and trust. People would not suffer such things were it not that they are so much in the dark. For that reason, these men are always most at work, and do most mischief in the darkest corners. Those whose eyes are weak, or who sit in bad light, are most easily made to see spectres and goblins, and in their most hideous forms.

The only cure against these mischiefs is to pour in light into every corner of the country. Let all the measures of the Government be accompanied by a blaze of day, and like the birds of night these animals are dislodged. They cannot bear the light. It can scarcely be conceived by those who have no calls to visit the interior and more retired parts of the country, how much the peace of our society is disturbed by the malicious propagation of poitical falsehood. The most wicked lies are kept in circulation, for months together, and before they can be effectually contradicted, the people have almost become frantic. For example, Mr. B. mentioned, that it had been asserted that a poll-tax of forty shillings per head had been laid on all the inhabitants, that the excise has been extended to wheat, to looms, and to the implements of husbandry, and that the late drafts of the eighty thousand militia are sold to France to carry on the war! It is probable that riots and insurrections are fomented by these rumors more than by all other causes. If a constant and regular publication of all that is done could be made to reach every part of the United States, it would be an effectual, and, perhaps, the only cure of these mischiefs. The people of this extensive country have, for these ten years, enjoyed all the essential benefits of society, on very easy terms. A man with five or six hundred acres of land is scarcely called upon for a dollar of taxes in a year. Perhaps no people on earth ever enjoyed so fully the benefits of society with so few burdens. Is it not a distressing consideration, that when we have so few real evils, we should create to ourselves imaginary ones, that give us so much useless uneasiness? Some wrong measures have taken place, and hereafter will take place, and nobody can expect that any kind of measures will give universal satisfaction. This would be to expect that the Government should be perfect and the people perfect. There is reason to hope that the Government will become more wise and cautious from experience, and that fewer of their measures will be obnoxious. But we need only to know our condition, and to be able to compare it to that of the rest of the world, to feel happy, and to do all in our power not to disgrace in the outset, the fair experiment in Government which this country has already so strongly recommended to the rest of the world. Mr. B. was persuaded that the more public measures were understood, the more this would be a common sentiment. He concluded by recommending some further and more extensive provision on the subject contemplated in the motion under consideration.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to report what further provisions are necessary for the general promulgation of the Laws of the United States.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. MOORE, Mr. BALDWIN, and Mr. HEISTER.

Mr. PARKER made a report from the select committee appointed to take into consideration that part of the PRESIDENT'S Speech which recommended opening a trade with the Indians.

The committee were of opinion that the plan suggested might be carried into execution for an expense of an hundred thousand dollars. The matter was referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

Mr. GILES then moved to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates of the militia, when called into the actual service of the United States.

The House accordingly went into a Committee of the Whole.

In the course of the discussion, Mr. HILLHOUSE having spoken for some time, Mr. DAYTON rose next. He began by remarking that it was not to be expected that he was to make any observations on what had been said by the member just sat down, as he did not hear ten words that the gentleman said. This was owing to noise in the House.

The Committee, after some time, rose, the Chairman reported progress, and the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 2.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, stating his intention of resigning his office on the last day of January next, and which he now communicates, in order that an opportunity may be given, previous to that event, to institute any further proceedings which may be contemplated, if any there be, in consequence of the inquiry during the last session, into the state of the Treasury Department; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

A memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, was presented to the House and read, praying that such further measures may be adopted for the effectual protection and preservation of the people of the said Territory, against the hostile incursions of the Indian tribes, as to the wisdom of Congress shall seem meet.

Ordered, That the said memorial be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

Mr. BOUDINOT, from the committee appointed to examine the Journal of the last session, and to report therefrom, all such matters of business as were then depending and undetermined; and, also, to examine and report such laws of the United States, as have expired, or will expire before the next session, made a further report; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

The House resumed the reading of the papers communicated by the Message from the PRESIDENT, on the 20th ultimo, and went through the same.

WEDNESDAY, December 3.

On a motion made and seconded that the House do come to the following resolution:

"Resolved, That provision be made by law for compensating the sufferers by the depredations of the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania."

Ordered, That the said motion be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

[H. or R.]

Thanks to General Wayne.

[DECEMBER, 1794.]

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you an official statement of the expenditure, to the thirtieth of September last, from the sums heretofore granted to defray the contingent expenses of Government, by acts passed the twenty-sixth day of March, one thousand seven hundred and ninety, and the ninth of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-four.

G. WASHINGTON.
UNITED STATES, December 3, 1794.

The said Message and statement were read and ordered to lie.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of George Blanchard, in behalf of Edward Blanchard; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to audit and pass the account of the late Edward Blanchard, deceased, according to the course of Treasury settlement.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. AMES, Mr. WINGATE, and Mr. GLAXN, do prepare and bring in the same.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee to whom were referred the reports of the Secretary of War, of the seventeenth of March last, on sixty petitions; whereupon,

Resolved, That Caleb Worley be placed on the list of pensioners, pursuant to the report of the Secretary of War.

Resolved, That Charles Fieger, from the peculiar circumstances attending his case, be also placed on the list of pensioners, and that he be allowed the half-pay of Captain.

Ordered, That the said resolutions be committed to the Committee of Claims, with instruction to prepare and bring in a bill or bills, pursuant thereto.

Ordered, That the reports of the Secretary of War on the several petitions of John Bennet, and Abraham Sutton, of John Lehman, and of Half-field White, which were made to this House, on the seventeenth of March last, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Ordered, That the report of the committee on the memorial of Joseph Hull, which was made on the twenty-second of April last, be also referred to the Committee of Claims.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes;

and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

THANKS TO GENERAL WAYNE.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, moved three resolutions of thanks, one to General Wayne, a second to the officers and soldiers of the legion, and a third to General Scott and the volunteers under his command. Mr. S. observed that the House had not, on their Journals, any vote of this nature. The American Armies in the Westward had, since the establishment of the new Constitution, been, till lately, rather unsuccessful. He did not wish to make the thanks of the House too cheap; but, at the same time, he thought this a proper opportunity to bestow them. He made the present motion with the more readiness and pleasure, because he had once had occasion to make a motion that ended in General Wayne being obliged to quit his seat in that House.

The resolution was read by the Clerk. Mr. GILES was sensible of the high merit of the officer and his troops; but the House assemble to legislate, not to give opinions. He wished that this measure might be deliberately weighed, as it might tend to consequences not yet foreseen, to go into a practice of this kind. He wished the House to go into a Committee on the subject.

Mr. SMITH vindicated the propriety of the resolutions. He adverted to the vote of opinion in the case of the French Constitution, and also on the death of Dr. FRANKLIN, which last, Mr. S. said, was like offering a vote of thanks to the dead.

Mr. SHERBURNE thought, that by delaying to press the resolutions, at present, it was more likely that they would pass with unanimity.

Mr. DEARBORN was willing to vote in general, but he could not vote for any particular thanks to General Wayne, on account of his attention to the discipline of the troops, because the member did not know anything particular of it. He wished the thing to be done promptly, or it would lose much of its merit.

Mr. SMITH withdrew the resolutions, and gave notice that he should bring them forward again to-morrow.

Mr. MURRAY moved a vote of thanks to the militia who have been lately called out in support of the laws of the United States. This was laid on the table till to-morrow.

A resolution respecting compensation to the individuals who have been personal sufferers in the late insurrection was called up, and, being read, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 4.

Mr. BEATTY, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for the relief of Peter Covenhoven; which was read twice, and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills for the relief of sick or disabled seamen; and that Mr. VENABLE, Mr. WINGATE, Mr. COBB, Mr. KITTERA, and Mr. CARNES, be the said committee.

[DECEMBER, 1794.]

Thanks to General Wayne.

[H. or R.]

Mr. FITZSIMONS, from the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of War, respecting the Fortifications of the United States, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes; and, after some time spent therein the Committee rose and reported progress.

THANKS TO GENERAL WAYNE.

Mr. W. SMITH wished to make his promised motion, which he prefaced by observing that he had varied it at the request of several gentlemen. In the original motion, he had particularly noticed the diligence of the General in disciplining his army to the nature of the service in which they were engaged, and his fortitude and perseverance in encountering the difficulties which opposed his march through a wilderness.

Though he and many others were ready to acknowledge in the fullest manner the merits of the General in those important particulars, yet as they were not matters of general notoriety, and as unanimity on an occasion like the present was extremely desirable, he had now confined the motion to the brilliant action of the 20th August. Mr. SMITH was ready to admit that there was no precedent on their Journals for a vote of thanks to the army; but it was not to be thence inferred that the measure was improper: unfortunately, no success had occurred since the establishment of the present Government which called for this testimony of public gratitude.

There were indeed on the Journals votes of thanks to the Speakers of the House, and there was a vote, on the death of Dr. Franklin, expressive of his services, both of which cases might be considered as bearing some analogy to the present, though not precisely similar.

Under the former Government innumerable circumstances might be quoted. With respect to the practice in itself, he had no doubt of its propriety. He considered this kind of remuneration as a just and merited reward for past services, and an honorable excitement to future exertions. Those who performed them were, in his opinion, entitled to the gratitude of their fellow citizens, which could be no otherwise publicly expressed than through their Constitutional organ, the Representatives of the people. When they had this claim, to withhold that public expression was to be unjust. Satisfied then, as he was, that General Wayne and the army under his command had deserved well of their country, had performed signal and splendid services, from which he anticipated very important advantages, he could not suppress this tribute of applause.

He was aware it might be said the House had already in their answer to the President's Speech bore ample testimony to the good conduct of the army, and that it was unnecessary to go farther;

but that was only a communication between the House and the President, and was not addressed to the army: a vote of thanks would be formally transmitted to the army; would be considered as an expression of the sensibility of the House, and would, he was persuaded, be highly gratifying to the gallant General and his brave army. Mr. SMITH said he felt a peculiar pleasure in making this motion, as he had on a former occasion found it his duty to make the motion which declared the vacancy of General Wayne's seat in the House, a circumstance which had given him considerable pain at the time, but which had proved a fortunate event, as an opportunity was thereby afforded the General of serving his country in the field.

Mr. SMITH concluded with saying, that as he had no doubt the services of the army had made the same impression on the House as they had on him, he trusted the motion he was about to make would be honored with an unanimous vote. He then moved the three resolutions, as follow:

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be given to Major General Wayne for the good conduct and bravery displayed by him in the action of the 20th August last with the Indians.

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be given to the brave officers and soldiers of the legion under the orders of Major General Wayne, for their patience, fortitude, and bravery.

Resolved, That the thanks of this House be given to Major General Scott, and to the gallant mounted volunteers from the State of Kentucky, who have served their country in the field during the late campaign, under the orders of Major General Wayne, for their zeal, bravery, and good conduct.

Mr. GILES foresaw many bad consequences that might ensue from the practice of giving opinions of men. One part of the House might be for a vote of thanks, and the other against it. He should vote for the proposition, but wished that some mode might be adopted for expressing the general opinion of the House against the practice.

Mr. KITTERA was for restoring the clause respecting the vigilance of General Wayne in attending to the discipline of his troops.

Mr. HULLHOUSE hoped that the resolutions would not be adopted. He should go farther than the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GILES] and vote against them. The House, in their answer to the President, had expressed their approbation, and that was enough. It was not the business of that House, but of the Executive, to express such things. Mr. H. had voted most cordially for that part of the Address respecting the Western army. The answer to the Speech of the President would always afford a good opportunity of conveying these kind of matters. It would immediately become necessary to give thanks in every case; and not to give them will be regarded as an implied censure. He trusted that the gentleman would withdraw his motion, and that the House in this way would get rid of it. He had, and he repeated it again, a high sense of the merit of the officers and soldiers of the army under General Wayne, but he had said so already in the Address to the President. It had been urged, as a precedent for this measure, that it was usual to thank the Speaker. This was a mere ceremony. He wished that it had never come into practice, but since it had been so, he should always agree to the vote of thanks.

Mr. MURRAY thought that we might trust that the House would always have too much prudence to abuse their thanks, by giving them improperly. By way of precedent, Mr. M. read a vote of the State of Virginia, thanking Governor Lee for his conduct in the Western insurrection.

Mr. NICHOLAS approved highly of the conduct of the troops, but it was only an act of duty. If we send soldiers against the Indians, it is supposed that they will stand to their posts, otherwise the Government cannot be supported even for a month.

Mr. HULLHOUSE saw no business which the House had with the proceedings in the State of Virginia. It had been hinted that the army under General Wayne might feel disagreeably, if the resolution should be rejected. With that Mr. H. had no business. He acted on principles without regarding the feelings of individuals.

Mr. W. SMITH agreed with gentlemen that the principal object of the House was to legislate; but it did not follow that they were to be confined merely to legislation. Every Legislative body exercised the right of opinion in cases where no act was to follow. This House has frequently exercised it: the answers to the President's Speech; the answer to the King of the French on his acceptance of the Constitution of ninety-one; the opinion of the House on the merits of that Constitution; the vote respecting Benjamin Franklin; the vote of last session in reply to a letter from the Committee of Public Safety of France; the votes of thanks to the Speakers, were precedents on the Journals which refuted a contrary doctrine. It had been said that the latter case was a mere matter of form. Mr. S. thought differently, and if ever he was in that House when a vote of thanks should be proposed to a Speaker who had no claim to it, he should feel it his duty to oppose it. Gentlemen apprehended that this practice might lead to innumerable difficulties hereafter. But every House would exercise its judgment and discretion. Members would not be so rash as to propose the thanks of the House where serious opposition was expected, nor would the thanks be voted unless well merited. It was unwilling as any member to make the thanks of the House too cheap; but all must confess that if ever there was an occasion where they were properly called for, this was one. To deny the right or expediency of the practice was in fact to strip the House of one of its most agreeable functions, that of expressing its gratitude.

It had been advanced as an objection, that the two Houses might differ; one might vote thanks and the other censure, in the same case; but that might happen in other cases where the propriety of expressing an opinion was admitted; in answering the President's Speech in the State Legislatures, where thanks were frequently voted, the two branches might differ: that was never deemed an objection to the practice; each House expressed its individual opinion.

Mr. SMITH said if the House had been sitting in September last when the account arrived of this victory, would the members have then felt as coldly as they now do? No; he was convinced that in the moment of joy and gratitude, they would have unanimously voted thanks to the army without the least hesitation; but they have since had time to cool, and the impression is worn away.

Gentlemen should consider the hard services of that army; how badly paid they were; the nature of the country they were in, and then determine whether the brilliant action of the 20th August is to go unrewarded? To appreciate truly the merits of that army in obtaining so signal a victory, let the House reflect on the consequences of a defeat: the army disbanded and broken up; the frontiers exposed to the ferocious savages; the combination of the tribes more cemented and formidable; an expensive, long, and bloody war. What is now our prospect? The frontiers protected; the combination of the tribes dissolved, and peace with them all a probable event.

Before, therefore, the motion which he had made could be got rid of, it was incumbent on the gentleman on the other side to show, either that it was improper in any case whatever to pass a vote of thanks, or that this was not a case entitled to them; to do the first they must establish, in the face of precedents innumerable, a doctrine destructive of one of the most amiable privileges of the House; to do the last, they must express a sentiment which would, he was persuaded, be repugnant to the sentiments of all their constituents, for throughout the United States there was but one opinion on this subject, and that was in unison with the motion. Having made the motion after due deliberation, he certainly should not withdraw it; but would submit it to the good sense of the House.

Mr. CORR moved the previous question. He thought the practice of dangerous consequence. It might produce much uncomfortable proceeding in that House. He was seconded by a number of members.

Mr. PARKER felt the highest esteem for the services of the Western army. He was intimate both with General Wayne and General Scott; but he disapproved of the practice upon principle. It was wrong in Mr. MURRAY to quote the proceedings in the Legislature of Virginia, where the Governor was in authority a mere cypher, because the two cases did not apply. The Federal Government was on a quite different footing, a mixture of monarchy, of aristocracy, and of democracy. The President represented the monarchical part. It was his business to give thanks, if requisite. If he himself was an officer in that army, Mr. P. said that he should be satisfied by the first thanks, those in the Answer to the President. He would be hurt by the second as unconstitutional. What if, in the mean time, General Wayne and his army may have committed some error that requires an inquiry, and the House are to go into it with this vote of thanks staring them in the face! It had been said by Mr. SMITH, that if we had been sitting in September, when this news arrived, a vote of thanks would have been passed immediately and unanimously. I believe no such thing (said Mr. P.) We should have recommended such a step to the President.

Mr. GILES said, that if there ever could have been any doubt as to the impropriety of the resolution, that was now removed, [alluding to the speech of Mr. PARKER.] He thought that the gentleman [Mr. CORR] who moved the previous question had acted from the best motives. Two gentlemen [Mr. GILES referred to Mr. SEDGWICK and Mr. AMES] had recommended an appeal to feeling. We are sent here to reason. A gentleman [Mr. SEDGWICK] says that he has feelings which he cannot express. Let him strive to express them. It is not expected that a member is to express all that he may feel on every subject.

Mr. MURRAY said he thought the present resolution proper, unexceptionable, and as the fate of this question would have an effect on the motion for thanks to the militia, which he brought forward yesterday, he hoped it would succeed, and that its mover [Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina] would not withdraw it. Gentlemen who are against the vote have talked of precedent. If an example would serve their feelings with a stimulus, he would take the liberty of calling their attention to a page he had in his hand, in which they would find that some of our constituents have got the start of us, for the House of Delegates of Virginia had very properly considered the conduct of their Governor [Mr. LEE] in a light which merited their thanks for his acceptance of the command of his fellow-citizens against the insurgents. Mr. M. read the vote from a newspaper, which was a unanimous one. He said he considered this circumstance as extremely auspicious to both votes.

He said he had no objection to consider the practice as founded in principles which would bear examination. He thought it more necessary in the administration of our Government—the great basis of which was public opinion—than in that of any other which he had read or heard of. Here our theories have made a bold appeal to the reason and feelings of our fellow-citizens. Neither titles, nor hereditary honors, nor crosses, nor ribands, nor stars, nor garters, are permitted or endurable. Neither would they be accepted here were they offered. We had but two ways, as far as his knowledge then served him, of rewarding or acknowledging great displays of public virtue. One way is by vote in money; the other by thanks expressed by vote, or presented and perpetuated in some memorial, as in a medal. The first is unequal, as the fortunes of men differ, so would such reward not be equally valuable to all its objects, and were it practicable to apportion this reward agreeably to the fortunes of men, there is a something ill-assorted in it with the idea of honorable ambition; nor did he think there was any good man who had a spark of what is called sentiment in his bosom, who would not say the reward was not only lame for want of uniformity, but defective in point of taste in its spectacle. He believed much in the sense of duty as a motive to good and reasonable services, and that an enlightened mind would feel the close alliance between interest and duty; but he held reward to be essential, politically considered, to the practice of great virtue, taking men as you find them. Not that money can be an adequate reward; it was therefore that he wished to see a style of acknowledgment derived both from the genius of the Government and congenial with the passions which work on the side of virtue—a mode as far removed from mere avarice as it was nearly associated to the movements of the most elevated minds. He readily yielded his belief that the gentlemen who were unwilling to adopt the practice fully admitted the merits to which they did not think it expedient to give a vote of thanks; but the precedent, founded expressly on the principle, that in no case of the greatest events are we to give thanks to the agents in them, will absolutely strip the Government of the only power its Constitution admits of conferring deserved distinction. He thought that public gratitude was a great fund, which if judiciously and delicately economized, might be rendered a source of great and good actions. It is an honor both to the nation that can feel and express it, and to those who receive it. He did not think it ought to be lightly drawn on, and hoped a line which it was more easy to conceive than draw, would be adopted by the House to save the Legislature from those perilous occasions which would lessen its value, and that no member would ever move a vote of thanks but upon the happening of some event so strikingly great and useful as to carry but one opinion. The two events designated at present (for he saw both votes were to have one fate) were great, highly interesting, and carried but one opinion. The army under General Wayne had gained a brilliant victory. It was, he believed, the first great victory that had attended the arms of the United States since the adoption of the Constitution. That army merited the thanks of their country, and we may say so. They had not only gained victory and fame, but had earned them in a solitude where the voice of fame could not be heard; in a profound wilderness, where neither the soothing of just ambition can reach them, nor the smiles of social and civilized life can comfort them after their severe labors.

The militia, both officers and men, in "quelling the insurrection," had displayed the wisdom and virtue which the Constitution had anticipated; had eminently deserved the most public testimony to their good conduct. Shall we, as we certainly feel this to be true, be deterred from expressing what we feel, because the folly of a future moment may possibly betray us into an undue multiplication of thanks, or because we may be harassed by a fatiguing succession of calls upon our gratitude? There could be little fear that great events would crowd too fast upon our feelings, and take up our time by applause, and he believed his constituents would readily admit the importance of two such events as some excuse for the time we consume in celebrating them.

In favor of the principle, we are supported by the example of the old Congress, by the practice of all nations, and by the known character of human nature in all cases and everywhere. The ancients and the moderns, by a variety of inventions and of policy, analogous to our object, endeavored to enlist all the passions in the public service. The old Congress understood the springs that work in great events, and though there was in the glorious Revolution which they guided, an ardor in the public mind that needed little aid, they did not disdain an appeal to the just pride and ambition of the individual; that the motives to public virtue might be multiplied, they in many instances took care that great events and services should be attended by some small but inestimable memorial.

Mr. ARKS.—The apprehensions of the House have been attempted to be alarmed, as if they were pushed to adopt hastily and unguardedly some dangerous new principle. The practice of all public bodies without exception, has been to express their approbation of distinguished public services. Instead of establishing a new principle, the attempt is now made to induce us to depart from an old one. Nay, the objection taken altogether is still more inconsistent and singular, for it is urged, the Answer of the House to the President's Speech has already expressed our approbation of the conduct of General Wayne and his army. It is, say they, superfluous to express it again. The argument opposed to the vote of thanks stands thus: It is a dangerous new principle, without a precedent, and without any just authority from the Constitution, to thank the army; for, the objectors add, we have in the Answer to the Speech expressed all that is contained in the motion. It is unusual to quote precedent, and our own recent conduct to prove a motion unprecedented, and to prove a measure new and dangerous because it has been adopted without question or apprehension heretofore.

The thanks of this body addressed directly to the army will be much more acceptable than an opinion concerning them in our Answer to the Speech, and which they may not happen ever to hear of.

It has been said, with an air of triumph, that we are to be guided by reasoning, not feeling, as if I had made an attempt by an appeal to the latter to lead the House astray. This observation appears to have made some impression, and it is proper therefore to notice it.

Reason is the test of what is true and what is useful. When our interests are depending on a vote, we cannot be too circumspect to avoid the intrusion of our feelings. During the last session the opposers of the measures which were then urged upon the House, used all their endeavors to expose their injurious tendency. Some of those who would now pass for all reason, made a boast then of being all feeling. Then they reproached us with an unchangeable adherence to what we thought the interests of the country: on such questions, where error may be ruin, the passions turn traitors. On such occasions we had our feelings, but we thought ourselves bound by all that we owed to duty and our country to suppress them. It was then proper to be cool, considerate, and cautious.

But is the present question of such a nature? It has nothing to decide respecting the abstract truth of the proposition, for the assertion contained in the vote of the merit of the army is undeniable; it cannot be opposed by any plea of public duty, for it is not an act of authority, nor will it affect any one interest or right of society.

It is simply a question of mere propriety; and is it a novelty, is it anything to alarm the caution of the House, that such questions are always to be decided by feeling? What but the sense of propriety induces me to perform to others the nameless and arbitrary duties, and to receive from others the rights which the civilities and refinements of life have erected into laws? In cases of a more serious kind, is not sentiment the only prompt and enlightened guide of our conduct? If I receive a favor, what but the sentiment of gratitude ought to direct me in my acknowledgments? Shall I go to my benefactor and say, Sir, I act coolly and carefully; I will examine all the circumstances of this transaction; and if upon the whole I find some cause of gratitude, I will thank you. Is this gratitude or insult? The man who affects to hold his feelings, and his best feelings back for this cold-blooded process of reasoning, has none. He deceives himself, and attempts to deceive others, if he pretends to reason up or to reason down the impressions which actions worthy of gratitude and admiration make upon his heart. Was it necessary to wait for the joy and exultation which the news of the victory of General Wayne instantly inspired, till we could proceed with all due phlegm and caution to analyze it? The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. NICHOLAS] has not even yet received the impressions which are so natural and so nearly universal; for he has insisted that the army has only done its duty, and therefore it is improper to express our thanks. Indeed, it has done its duty, but in a manner the most splendid, the most worthy of admiration and thanks. That gentleman has also expressed his doubts of the very important nature of the victory, and one would suppose it was thought by many a very trivial advantage that is gained. It is such an one, however, as has humbled a victorious foe; as has avenged the slaughter of two armies; as gives us the reasonable prospect of a speedy peace. Can we desire anything more ardently than a termination of the Indian war?

The same gentleman, or some other opposing the vote of thanks, has said, if our armies have done well, they are paid for it, as if money was the measure and the recompense of merit. No, sir, our soldiers did not reason coldly (as we are now exhorted to do) in the day of battle. When the war-whoop would have shrunk hearts that had nothing more than reasoning on their wages and their services to animate them, did our brave soldiers think only of their ninetence a day? If they had, we should not have had this occasion to offer to them the thanks of the nation.

A soldier, of all men, looks to this kind of recompense for his services; and surely, to look to the approbation and applause of his country, is one means of keeping alive the sentiments of citizenship which ought not to be suffered to expire even in a camp. Shall we make it an excuse for refusing to pass this vote that we establish the principle of thanking nobody? Is not this, as a principle, as novel, as improper, as that which alarms our opponents? And shall we establish it as a principle against the known practice of other assemblies and of this, and against the intrinsic propriety of the case, merely because we think our discretion will not be firm enough in future to prevent the abuse of the practice? Scarcely any abuse could have a worse influence than the refusal to adopt this vote, because, should the negative prevail, what would the army believe? Would they not say, a vote of thanks has been rejected? It is said we have not done much, and what we have done is merely our duty, for which we receive wages?

The debate has taken such a turn, that I confess I could have wished the motion had not been made. For the most awkward and ridiculous thing in the world is to express our gratitude lothly. But at least it offers to those who fear that votes of thanks will be too frequent, some security against their apprehensions. Would any man risk the feelings and character of his friend by an attempt to force a vote of thanks by a bare majority through the House? No, an ingenious mind will shrink from this gross reward. If there is any force in the precedent it is feared we are now making, it will operate more to deter from than to invite the repetition.

Mr. DEARBORN was in favor of the original motion. In addition to some remarks relative to the Republicanism of the idea of the Representatives of the people thanking the armies of the people for their prowess and victories, he compared the argument against the resolutions on the score of abuse to a miser's excusing himself from the practice of charity, lest he should bestow it on unworthy objects.

Mr. RUTHERFORD was opposed to the previous question. He hoped the resolution of thanks would pass without a dissenting voice.

The previous question was now called for, by five members, viz: "Shall the main question to agree to the said resolution, be now put?" And

On the previous question, "Shall the said main question be now put?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 52, nays 36, as follows:

YEA.—Fisher Ames, James Armstrong, Abraham Baldwin, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Lambert Cadwalader, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, William

J. Dawson, Henry Dearborn, Gabriel Duval, William Findley, Thomas Fitzsimons, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, James Gillespie, Henry Glenn, James Gordon, Christopher Greenup, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, William Barry Grove, George Hancock, Daniel Heister, Henry Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Wilkes Kittera, Henry Latimer, Amasa Learned, William Lynna, Francis Malbone, William Montgomery, Peter Mulenberg, William Vans Murray, Joseph Neville, Andrew Pickens, Robert Rutherford, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, Jeremiah Smith, William Smith, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Philip Van Cortlandt, Peter Van Gaasbeck, Peleg Wadsworth, John Watts, Paine Wingate, Richard Winn, and Joseph Winston.

And then the main question being put, that the House do agree to the said resolution, it was Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be given to the brave officers and soldiers of the legion under the orders of Major General Wayne, for their patience, fortitude, and bravery.

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be given to Major General Scott, and to the gallant mounted volunteers from the State of Kentucky, who have served their country in the field, during the late campaign, under the orders of Major General Wayne, for their zeal, bravery, and good conduct.

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to transmit the foregoing resolutions; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH and Mr. MURRAY be appointed a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT therewith.

On motion of Mr. MURRAY,

Resolved, unanimously, That the thanks of this House be given to the gallant officers and privates of the Militia of the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, who, on the late call of the PRESIDENT, rallied round the standard of the laws, and, in the prompt and severe services which they encountered, bore the most illustrious testimony to the value of the Constitution, and the blessings of internal peace and order; and that the PRESIDENT be requested to communicate the above vote of thanks in such manner as he may judge most acceptable to the patriotic citizens who are its objects.

Ordered, That Mr. WILLIAM SMITH and Mr. MURRAY be appointed a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT with the foregoing resolution.

FRIDAY, December 5.

Ordered, That the report of the committee to whom was referred the Message from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the thirtieth of January, seventeen hundred and ninety-four, enclosing the copy of a Letter from the Governor of North Carolina, covering a resolution of the Legislature of that State; as also the petitions of Thomas Person and others, proprietors in lands in the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, and of the Trustees of the University of North Carolina, which was made to this House on the 19th of February last, be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, on the bill for the relief of Peter Covenhoven; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the estimates of appropriation for the service of the year 1795; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the following resolution; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, viz:

Resolved, That, for the expenditure of the Civil List of the United States for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, together with the incidental and contingent expenses of the several Departments and offices thereof, there be appropriated the several sums of money following, to wit:

[Here follows a list of all the appropriations, amounting, in the whole, to $3,352,250.]

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. FITZSIMMONS, Mr. SHARPSHUR BOURKE, and Mr. GRIFFIN, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House to whom was committed the bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, and called into actual service, and for other purposes, be discharged from the further consideration thereof; and that the said bill be recommitted to Mr. GILES, Mr. SEDGWICK, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. LOCKE, and Mr. VAN CORTLANDT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the third instant, "that provision be made by law, for compensating the sufferers by the depredations of the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania," and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

Ordered, That the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from further proceeding on the said motion, and that so much of the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES as relates to the subject-matter thereof, be committed to Mr. HULLHOUSE, Mr. FINDLEY, Mr. LYMAN, Mr. WATTS, and Mr. WILLIAM SMITH.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the Committee to whom was referred that part of the Speech of the PRESIDENT, which relates to the improvement of harmony with the Indian nations, within the limits of the United States, by fixing and conducting of trading houses; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the following resolution, which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, viz:

Resolved, That ——— dollars be appropriated for the purpose of carrying on trade with the Indian nations.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. PARKER, Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. BOUNDNOT, Mr. FINDLEY, and Mr. GREENUP, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, December 8.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Peter Covenhoven, was read the third time and passed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to examine and report what proceedings have been had under the act of Congress, entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," passed the 5th of March, 1792; also, to report whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to the several laws respecting the Military Establishment, and the protection of the frontiers of the United States.

And a committee was appointed of Mr. NICHOLAS, Mr. DEARBORN, and Mr. SMILE.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish a uniform rule of Naturalization," and that Mr. MADISON, Mr. DEXTER, and Mr. CARNES, be the said committee.

Mr. PRESTON, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of sundry inhabitants living between the lines commonly called Walker's and Henderson's lines, made a report, which was read: Whereupon,

Resolved, That a law should pass, establishing Walker's line as the Southern boundary between the State of Virginia and the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, reserving to the said inhabitants their claims to lands lying between the said lines, according to the laws of the State under which they claim.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. PRESTON, Mr. WINSTON, and Mr. PICKENS, do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS from the committee appointed, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five; which was read twice and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the Report of the Secretary of War, respecting the fortifications of the United States.

The first resolution of the report was then read; and, after some further discussion, the Committee rose, and the Chairman reported progress.

Mr. PARKER then moved that the PRESIDENT should be requested to cause the proper officer to lay before the House a copy of instructions to the superintendents and engineers for the erection of the fortifications in the ports and harbors of the United States. A committee was accordingly appointed to wait on the PRESIDENT.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to establish a uniform system of Bankruptcy throughout the United States; and that Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, Mr. SEDGWICK, and Mr. VENABLE, be the said committee.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to prepare and bring in a bill or bills to authorize the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES to receive on loan a sum not exceeding two millions of dollars, at a rate of interest not exceeding five per cent., payable at the pleasure of the United States; and that Mr. FITZSIMMONS, Mr. HINDMAN, and Mr. COLES, be the said committee.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of this House, to examine and report what business is necessary to be done during the present session; the Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to amend and explain the twenty-second section of the act 'Establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States,'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. W. SMITH immediately remarked that it would be necessary to appoint three prophets to confer with the committee of the Senate.

Mr. SEDGWICK moved that the House should agree to the motion of the Senate.

Mr. DAYTON said, that it was beyond the abilities of any committee to comply with such a requisition. He himself had several matters to propose, that he had never yet mentioned; and he could not be one of the committee, for he was on two committees already. But, besides that, other gentlemen are daily bringing up new business, which they think of importance. He mentioned, as an instance, the unexpected motion just now made by a gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MADISON,] on the Naturalization Bill, which seemed to meet the universal concurrence of the House. Six weeks hence there may be a shadow of propriety in such a request from the Senate.

Mr. SEDGWICK defended his motion as a matter of civility.

Mr. W. SMITH said, that such a message had a very odd appearance from the Senate. It was but ten or fourteen days since they had formed a quorum, and now they are inquiring when are we to adjourn?

Mr. SEDGWICK said, they have not asked this question.

Mr. SMITH replied, that this was the intention of the message. He himself would, perhaps, have important business, two or three weeks hence, to bring forward from his constituents, but it was impossible for him to give an account of it just now.

The House had, two or three days ago, told the PRESIDENT that they were going to consider the subjects recommended in his Speech, and now they are called on to conclude the business.

Mr. SEDGWICK withdrew his motion.

The last-mentioned bill in the message was read twice, and committed.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to consider and report on the expediency of making further provision in the laws of the United States, relative to the cession of the jurisdiction by particular States, in lands where are established, or may by law be directed to be built and established, light-houses, buoys, and public piers.

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. COIT, Mr. TREDEWELL, and Mr. LEE.

TUESDAY, December 9.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to establish a uniform system of Bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was twice read and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. FITZSIMMONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill authorizing a loan of two millions of dollars; which was twice read and committed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill sent from the Senate entitled "An act to amend and explain the twenty-second section of the act 'establishing the Judicial Courts of the United States.'"

The bill was reported to the House without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. W. SMITH rose and said, that he had in his hand a letter from Magdeburgh, in Germany, addressed to the Congress. A number of families there wanted to emigrate into this country, but before they ventured on that step, they wished to have answers to several queries, which they proposed. One of these excited a general smile in the House. It was, whether there was in America a quick demand for Physicians and Divines? Some other queries went to ascertain whether money could be borrowed, if it should chance to be wanted, for carrying on manufactures, such as tan works. Mr. S. said, that having received this letter, addressed to Congress, he had thought it his duty to read a translation of it to the House.

The SPEAKER [Mr. Muhlenberg] informed the House that there was an incorporated German Society in Philadelphia, who had already sent to Germany a full answer to every query of this kind, which could be put; and this paper had been published. But he would take care that the letter should have a proper answer. [The SPEAKER himself is the President of this Society.]

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee on the Message of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, of the thirtieth of January last, enclosing the copy of a letter from the Governor of North Carolina, covering a resolution of the Legislature of that State; as, also, the petitions of Thomas Person and others, proprietors of lands in the Territory of the United States South of the river Ohio, and of the Trustees of the University of North Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported progress.

THE MINT.

The House then took up the motion of Mr. Corr, relative to the Mint. The letter of Mr. Rittenhouse, referred to yesterday, was again read.

Mr. Boudinot drew the attention of the House for some time, by a series of the most interesting observations. He went to the Bank of the United States to inquire for cents. He was told that there were none to be had, because the Bank could not get them from the Mint. He then went to the Mint, where he was informed that cents were not coined faster, because the officers of the Mint did not know where to get them vented. He said that this Mint cost twenty-four thousand dollars per annum, and every cent coined there cost the public several cents, though he could not exactly tell how many. In New Jersey far more cents had been coined in a few months than had ever been coined altogether at the Mint of the United States, and this had been done at one fortieth part of the expense which the Mint of the United States has cost.

Several other members adverted to the prodigious inconvenience which is felt all over the Union for want of copper coin; and it appeared to excite some curiosity, on what foundation the officers of the Mint said that they could not get their cents vented. It was remarked by Mr. W. Smith that, except as to Philadelphia, the Mint is of little or no use whatever. The cents given out never go farther than the city.

A committee of three members were appointed to examine and report on the state of the Mint, and what means may be used to render the institution more beneficial to the United States.

WEDNESDAY, December 10.

An engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill authorizing a Loan of two millions of dollars was read the third time, and passed.

A petition of William Rotch and Sons, of Nantucket, in the State of Massachusetts, was presented to the House and read, praying that they may be exonerated from the payment of the duties imposed on foreign vessels, to which they will be subjected, in the case of the ships Maria and Diana, the property of the petitioners, which, being absent from the United States, were not registered within the time prescribed by law. Also,

A petition of Epaphras Jones, of the city of New York, in behalf of himself, Stephen Gorham, Shubal Gorham, Charles Selden, of the said city, merchants, and owners of the brigantine called the Peru, of New York, praying that the Collector of the port of New York may be authorized to receive the oaths of the said Stephen Gor-

THURSDAY, December 11.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to you, for consideration, a representation made to me by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of constituting an officer to be specially charged with the business of procuring certain public supplies.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 11, 1794.

The said Message and representation were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GILLES, from the committee to whom was re-committed the bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes, reported an amendatory bill; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House immediately.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the said Committee; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which were severally twice read, and agreed to by the House.

Ordered, That the said bill, with the amendments, be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a Letter and Report from the Secretary of War, respecting the difficulties and inconveniences which had occurred in the execution of the act, entitled "An act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing a uniform Militia throughout the United States," in pursuance of a resolution of this House, of the 25th ultimo; which were read, and ordered to be referred to the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the better organizing, arming, and disciplining the Militia of the United States.

Mr. PUESOT, from the committee appointed, presented a bill for determining the Northern boundary of the Territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. HULLHOUSE, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the Speech of the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which relates to the policy of indemnifying the sufferers by the depredations of the insurgents in the Western counties of Pennsylvania, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill to authorize the officers of the Treasury to audit and pass the account of the late Edward Blanchard, deceased; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported the bill without amendment.

Ordered, That the said bill be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

FRIDAY, December 12.

An engrossed bill to regulate the pay of the non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, of the Militia of the United States, when called into actual service, and for other purposes, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to authorize the officers of the Treasury to audit and pass the account of the late Edward Blanchard, deceased, was read the third time and passed.

A petition of George Gibbs, of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, merchant, was presented to the House and read, praying that he may be allowed the drawback of the duties on a quantity of wines exported to Calcutta, in the East Indies, in December, 1790, and of which, owing to unavoidable circumstances, he has not been able to produce the certificates required by law to cancel the bond given on the exportation of the same.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the committee on the memorial of Tobias Rudolph, representative of John Rudolph, deceased, which was made to this House on the 23d day of April last. Whereupon, Ordered, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized to accept the vouchers produced in support of the claim of John Rudolph, deceased, late a Major in Lieutenant Colonel Lee's legion of the Continental Army, and to pay the amount of the said claim to Tobias Rudolph, as the legal representative of the deceased.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution; and that Mr. CHASTAINE, Mr. SHERBURNE, and Mr. BAILEY, do prepare and bring in the same.

BALANCES DUE THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HEATH next read the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury cause to be laid before the House a statement of the balances remaining unpaid, if any, which may have been due by individuals to the United States, previous to the 4th of March, 1789, and whether any, and what steps have been taken to recover the same. And also a statement of the sundry sums of public money, which may have been intrusted to individuals previous to the said 4th day of March, 1789, and have not been accounted for."

Mr. HEATH introduced this resolution, with some remarks on the impropriety of making new Loans, if anything could be had from the debts due to the United States.

It was agreed to take up the resolution.

Mr. SENEWICK moved to refer it to a select committee. He observed that a gentleman who was not at present here, [Mr. JEREMIAH WADSWORTH,] and who knew more of the public accounts of the United States than any gentleman in the House, had always opposed motions of this kind. He gave as a reason that people could not get their accounts settled with the Treasury after waiting months. This arose from the confusion and loss of documents; and it would be wrong to be hasty in publishing them as debtors.

Mr. FRIZMONS said that ever since the new Government had been established, ten or twelve clerks had constantly been employed in endeavoring to settle these accounts between the United States and individuals. He was not sure but these debts had cost more trouble to the United States than they are worth. Some people are stated in the books of the United States as debtors to the extent of millions, who call themselves creditors to the United States. He moved another resolution, which would answer all the purposes intended by Mr. HEATH; and this was, that a committee should be appointed to inquire what progress had been made in the settlement of public accounts, whether any further measures were wanted to expedite the business, and to get a state of balances due.

Mr. HEATH withdrew his motion, and a committee of five was appointed agreeably to the resolution proposed by Mr. FRIZMONS.

PAY OF MILITIA OFFICERS.

The House then took up the following resolution, laid on the table yesterday by Mr. BLOUNT, that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for regulating the pay of commissioned officers of the Militia of the United States, viz.:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill to regulate the pay and allowances to the commissioned officers of the Militia of the United States."

Mr. BLOUNT said, that the low pay of the soldiers in the militia was not a cause of greater discontent than the high pay of the commissioned officers.

Mr. BLOUNT moved that the House should go into a Committee of the Whole on this subject. Mr. PARKER was in favor of the House going into a Committee.

Mr. FRIZMONS was for a select committee, in the first place, because he thought it improper to plunge into so wide a subject at once, without any rule or principle to direct them.

Mr. CLAIRBORNE argued for a select committee in the first place. He said that four thousand and fifty-seven dollars per annum were given to a Major-General, which would be sufficient for paying twenty-eight or twenty-nine men. This was an absurdity, and the Army were sick of it. He wanted a select committee first, that some kind of shape might be given to the resolution.

Mr. B. BOURNE had never heard any complaints against the pay of the militia officers as being too high. He had heard complaints on many other payments made by Government—such as the six dollars a day to members of that House. He would think it very improper to make any distinction between the pay of officers in the militia, and the other troops. We have been raising the pay of the privates in the militia somewhat above that of the regulars; and now it is proposed to reduce the pay of the militia officers below that of the regulars. He thought that all this had somewhat of an odd appearance.

The resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 10th instant, making provision for effecting the transfer of so much of the stock standing to the credit of any State, to creditors of such State, as may be necessary to satisfy their respective demands; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said motion under consideration, and made no amendment thereto.

The said motion was again read, and, on the question put thereupon, agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision be made for effecting the transfer of so much of the stock standing to the credit of any State, pursuant to the report of the Commissioners for settling accounts between the United States and individual States, to creditors of such State, as may be necessary to satisfy their respective demands, with the consent of the said State, and its creditors.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. BENJAMIN BOURNE, Mr. SWIFT, and Mr. VAN GAASBECK, do prepare and bring in the same.

MONDAY, December 15.

Two other members, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN PAGE; and from North Carolina, BENJAMIN WILLIAMS, appeared, and took their seats in the House.

Mr. NICHOLAS, from the committee appointed, to examine and report what proceedings have been had under the act "For making further and more effectual provision for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," and to report whether any, and what, amendments are necessary to the several laws respecting the Military Establishment, and the protection of the frontiers of the United States, made a report which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House tomorrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the report of the committee to whom was referred the petition of William Dewees; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and come to no resolution thereupon.

Resolved, That the petition of the said William Dewees be rejected.

Mr. CHASTINE, from the committee appointed, presented, according to order, a bill for the benefit of Tobias Rudolph, representative of Major John Rudolph, deceased, which was twice read, and committed.

PAY OF THE MILITIA OFFICERS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the motion of the 12th instant, "that a Committee be appointed to bring in a bill to regulate the pay and allowances to the commissioned officers of the Militia of the United States."

Mr. SEDGWICK never had been in the militia, and he was very sure that he never should be, but this did not hinder him from feeling when they were hardly treated. It would depress, discourage, and disgust militia officers, to see the regulars better paid than themselves.

On the suggestion of Mr. MÜHLENBERG, (the Speaker,) the original resolution was restricted to these words:

"Resolved, As the opinion of this Committee, that the pay of the militia officers ought to be reduced."

Mr. BLOUNT, Mr. FINDLEY, and Mr. ROTHERFORD, were for the reduction. The latter gentleman was adverse to the great distinction in the pay of officers and soldiers, as, from its extreme inequality, too much resembling Monarchy.

Mr. HEATH was opposed to the motion on the table. He thought that it would have an effect to damp that military ardor which the House had experienced in the recent example before them in their militia, who might be called on again to resume their tour of duty. A comparative reasoning cannot be drawn with justice and truth, from the pay fixed by Congress in 1775, for the regular army. That was a time, when the citizens of America embarked in the common cause of their country upon a revolutionary ground more than from pecuniary motives; but now, when the country has a permanent independent Government, there ought to be a better reason given for reducing the pay of the militia officers, than has been already adduced in the debate. If this resolution obtains it will have another pernicious effect. It would badly reward this great body of our militia, to be called from their homes, upon the spur of an occasion, under manifold difficulties and inconveniences; every one must, at the same time, confess that the militia are the great bulwark of our Republic. This resolution might, in the end, tend to make them inferior and subordinate to the present small Military Establishment of the United States. Most of the militia go into the army professionally to continue. This is not the case with the militia, whose time of service expires with the tour.

After some further remarks from different gentlemen, the Committee disagreed to the resolution. The Chairman reported that they had come to no resolution; and the question was then taken on the report of the committee, to which the House agreed.

The yeas and nays were taken, and were—yeas 50, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS.—Fisher Ames, Abraham Baldwin, John Beatty, Elias Boudinot, Shearjashub Bourne, Benjamin Bourne, Gabriel Christie, David Cobb, Peleg Coffin, Joshua Coit, Jonathan Dayton, Henry Dearborn, George Dent, Samuel Dexter, Gabriel Duvall, Dwight Foster, Ezekiel Gilbert, Nicholas Gilman, Henry Glenn, Benjamin Goodhue, Andrew Gregg, Samuel Griffin, Thomas Hartley, John Heath, James Hillhouse, William Hindman, Samuel Holten, John Hunter, John Wilkes Kittera, Richard Bland Lee, Francis Malbone, Peter Muhlenberg, William Vans Murray, Joseph Neville, Alexander D. Orr, Andrew Pickens, Francis Preston, Thomas Scott, Theodore Sedgwick, John S. Sherburne, Jeremiah Smith, Zephaniah Swift, George Thatcher, Uriah Tracy, Jonathan Trumbull, John E. Van Allen, Peter Van Gaaubeck, Peleg Wadsworth, John Watts, and Richard Winn.

The resolution for reducing the pay of the officers of the militia was therefore rejected.

CLAIM OF STEPHEN SAYRE.

It was next moved, that the House go into a Committee on the report of the Secretary of State on the petition of Stephen Sayre. The House resolved itself accordingly—Mr. COBB in the Chair.

Many objections were made to the claims of this gentleman.

Mr. BOURNOR said, that Mr. Sayre assumed the merit of the armed neutrality to himself, and this position was unfounded. The armed neutrality arose from a misunderstanding between two Russian Ministers, that produced some intrigues ending in this measure. He condemned the silence of Mr. Sayre, while Mr. ARTHUR LEE and Dr. FRANKLIN were alive; as they would have been the most effectual evidences in his favor.

Mr. PARKER explained that, during a long interval, Mr. Sayre was not in this country, and therefore had not an opportunity to make the use proposed of their testimony.

Mr. SWIFT disbelieved what Mr. Sayre, in one part of his memorial, alleged, viz: that he, by his own personal influence, had persuaded the King of Prussia to set on foot the armed neutrality. As he firmly believed that this part of the memorial was not true, Mr. S. thought himself entitled to doubt the correctness of other parts of it.

Mr. HILLHOUSE, Mr. CORR, and some other members, also spoke. It was observed that the Committee were, in some material particulars, uninformed, and that it would be better for the Committee to rise, and the Chairman to ask leave to sit again. The Committee rose accordingly.

Mr. MADISON, from the committee appointed, presented a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to establish an uniform rule of Naturalization;" which was read twice, and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the estimates of appropriation for the service of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-five; and, after some time spent therein, the Chairman reported that the Committee had again had the said estimates under consideration, and come to a resolution thereupon; which was twice read, and agreed to by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That there be appropriated for the pay, subsistence, forage, and other expenses attending the militia in their late expedition to the western counties of Pennsylvania, a sum not exceeding — dollars.

Ordered, That a bill or bills be brought in pursuant to the said resolution, and that Mr. FIRZSIXONS, Mr. SHERRARD, BOURNE, and Mr. GRIFFIN, do prepare and bring in the same.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire if any, or what alterations ought to be made to the act, passed the 7th day of June, 1794, entitled "An act concerning invalids."

And a committee was appointed, of Mr. BOUNDARY, Mr. GREENUP, and Mr. GILLESPIE.

Ordered, That a committee be appointed to inquire how far the Post Office Law has been carried into execution, and to report thereon; and that Mr. BALDWIN, Mr. GROVE, and Mr. WINN, be the said committee.

Mr. WILLIAM SMITH, from the committee appointed to prepare and report a plan for the redemption of the Public Debt, made a report; which was read, and ordered to be committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

TUESDAY, December 16.

A petition of sundry soldiers of the late Army of the United States, whose names are thereunto subscribed, was presented to the House and read, praying that the locations, which they have made of the respective proportions of lands due for their military services during the late war, in the second range of townships, on the river Ohio, together with the improvements thereon, may be confirmed to them, and grants issued for the same.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. HARTLEY, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. WINSTON; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

A petition of Isaac Taylor and John Harvey, of the town of Newbern, in the State of North Carolina, merchants, was presented to the House and read, praying a remission of the duties accruing on a quantity of rum, sugar, and coffee, the property of the petitioners, which were consumed by fire, together with the storehouses in which they were deposited, in the months of October and November last.

Ordered, That the said petition be referred to Mr. PARKER, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. OKR; that they do examine the matter thereof, and report the same, with their opinion thereupon, to the House.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Gentlemen of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

I transmit to Congress the copy of a Letter from the Secretary of State, with his account, as adjusted with the Treasury Department, of the expenditure of moneys appropriated for our intercourse with foreign nations, up to the first of July, one thousand seven hundred and ninety four.

G. WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, December 16, 1794.

The said Message and papers were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES be requested to cause a report to be laid before this House of the measures that have been adopted, pursuant to the act of the twenty-seventh of March last, for building ships; of the progress hitherto made; the compensation allowed to persons employed in the different branches of the business; together with an estimate of the expense for completing the same.

Ordered, That Mr. GILMAN and Mr. PRESTON be appointed a committee to wait on the PRESIDENT with the foregoing resolution.

Mr. FIRZSIXONS, from the committee appointed, presented a bill making appropriations for the expense of the Militia lately called into the service of the United States; which was twice read and committed.

MAJOR RUDOLPH'S CLAIM.

Mr. CHRISTIE moved that the House should go into a Committee, on the report from the select committee, for the relief of Tobias Rudolph, representative of the late Major John Rudolph, deceased. The House resolved itself into a Committee accordingly, Mr. COGG in the Chair.

The bill being read by the Clerk, Mr. MADISON proposed, as an amendment, to strike out the name of Tobias Rudolph, and leave it standing merely the representative of Major John Rudolph, because the House did not know whether this Tobias was the legal representative or not. This might hereafter become a legal question. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRACY and Mr. SWIFT objected strongly to this bill, as breaking through an established rule. Mr. TRACY observed, that if the representative of Major Rudolph could not bring authentic evidence of his demand, that was no reason why he should obtain it without evidence. He was in that case an unfortunate person, but so were ten thousand others besides him.

Mr. DUVALL vindicated the justice of the demand. Major General Lee, and two other officers, attested that they had seen Major Rudolph pay the money out of his own pocket.

Mr. FIRZSIXONS recommended that there should be an alteration in wording the bill, and for this purpose to recommit it.

Mr. CARVES could not see the propriety of altering the bill. He thought that as much of it might be changed, if an alteration was at all necessary, without rising. The original documents had been carried off by the enemy; no better evidence could be got than what had now been offered. Mr. C. was for the bill as it stood.

Mr. SEDGWICK was against the bill, and Mr. NICHOLAS defended it.

Mr. TRACY inquired what right this person had to claim the debts due to a gentleman deceased? Was he administrator or executor? had he any more right than Mr. TRACY, or any body else, to seek this money.

Mr. CHRISTIE replied, that Mr. Tobias Rudolph was brother to the deceased, and legally authorized to claim debts due him.

Mr. VANS MURRAY was in favor of the bill, with a modification.

Mr. MONTGOMERY was entirely against the demand.

Mr. SEDGWICK thought that the people of this country never could be safe against claims, if those of the present kind were admitted. It might be hard on this representative of Major Rudolph, but it would be harder on the public at large, if this bill were to pass. A door will thus be opened to advance frauds on the Treasury faster than any Legislature can vote money to supply them. Is it proper to pay money on the evidence of a certificate from certain military officers, that fourteen years ago money was advanced by Major Rudolph? How could these gentlemen know that the Major had not previously been furnished with it? It was improper to urge the characters of the gentlemen here introduced as witnesses. They were no doubt highly respectable, but this instance might serve as a precedent for different characters. We must not yield to individual feelings, but adhere to general principles.

Mr. CHRISTIE had seen claims admitted which had not half the evidence that there is in this case. There could be no better evidence than was here produced. It had been alleged that there never was any case like this formerly before the House. The assertion was not true. It was not a fact that the case was unprecedented. He defied the member who spoke last, [Mr. SEDGWICK,] with all his ingenuity, to devise better evidence than that which had been here brought. He said there had been more time spent upon this question than the worth of the whole sum. He did not wish to detain the Committee. To put an end to the dispute, he should move at once for the Committee to rise and the Chairman to report progress. This was agreed to and done accordingly; but when leave was asked to sit again, the House refused, and the case was at last referred to the Committee of Claims.

CLAIM OF STEPHEN SAYRE.

It was then moved that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from further consideration of the Report of the Secretary of State, on the memorial of Stephen Sayre. The resolution passed in the affirmative. It was next moved to refer it to the Committee of Claims, which was negatived—yeas 34, nays 46.

It was then moved and agreed to read the Report of the Secretary of State, on the claim of Mr. Sayre, which was done accordingly.

Mr. BOURNIXOR observed, that he was called upon to give his assent to a report of the special committee, for paying out of the Treasury a large sum of money, which he could not consistently do without examining into the facts, as they appeared from the vouchers on the table. Mr. Sayre's account amounted to upwards of £4,000 sterling—a sum which would certainly justify the attention of the Committee to the nature and circumstances of the demand. It is founded on an appointment (by our Commissioners in Europe) of Mr. Sayre in 1777, as Secretary to Mr. Arthur

Lee, then a Commissioner to the Court of Berlin. Mr. Sayre states that Mr. Lee staid at Berlin about five weeks, but that he himself remained five months. That in 1778, he went to other Courts in Europe at the request of the Commissioners, &c., for which he charges a salary at the rate of £1,000 sterling per annum. In May, 1777, he received 2,000 livres from Mr. Lee, which he credits in his account. It does not appear that any application was made for this balance to the Commissioners in Europe; but in April, 1785, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs reports to Congress on a petition presented by Mr. Sayre, claiming the balance of his account; and after stating the allegations of Mr. Sayre, declares his opinion that Mr. S. is entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services, but that a copy of the report should be sent to Dr. FRANKLIN and Mr. Lee, and that they should be requested to inform Congress in what manner and capacity, and on what terms, Mr. S. had been employed. Mr. Lee was a delegate in Congress, as appears from the Journals, from January 1783, till April, 1784, when he was appointed a Commissioner for Indian Affairs, to hold the treaty of Fort Stanwix; this Treaty is dated October, 1784. In August, 1785, Mr. Lee was chosen one of the Board of Treasury, (whose duty it became to report on all demands against the United States,) and continued in that office till 1789. Dr. FRANKLIN arrived in America some time about the year 1785 or 1786. In 1783, Mr. Sayre arrived in Philadelphia, and it was not till 1785 that he petitioned Congress, though Mr. Lee was a great part of that time one of that body. It does not appear that any application was made either to Mr. FRANKLIN or Mr. Lee, under the Report of the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, but in December, 1786, application was made by Mr. Sayre to Silas Deane, in England, who gave him a certificate of his appointment, a man whose emolument to the United States had placed him in a state of banishment from this country. Among other services also stated by Mr. Sayre, is his agency in bringing about the armed neutrality during the late war.

Mr. B. then reminded the Committee of the danger there was in determining on the state of facts of such long standing. That as to the armed neutrality, Mr. B. appealed to the historical knowledge of most of the gentlemen of the Committee, if this fact was possible? This extraordinary measure, it was well known, took its rise from the state of parties in the Court of Russia. One of the Secretaries of State, with the British Minister on one side, and the other Secretary on the other; and so secret was this transaction, that the first news the British Minister received of its existence, was from the announcing of it to his own Court. The next fact in which Mr. Sayre is mistaken, is the salary of the Secretary to a Commissioner. By the resolution of the former Congress, upon the Journals of 1780, (in his hands,) this salary is declared to be but £300 sterling per annum. Yesterday Mr. B. said he had suggested from his memory a slight remembrance of some charge of Mr. Lee in the settlement of his ac-
